REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE LAWS.

Thoughts on Secondary Punishments, in a Letsome Observations on Colonisation. By R. Whately, D.D., Archbishop of Dublin. 8vo. pp. 204. London, 1832. Fellowes.

This is an important view of a very important subject; one deeply affecting the moral condition of the people of this realm, and the happiness and prosperity of the realm itself. It is, indeed, most astonishing to look at the systems of jurisprudence which have prevailed,—at the system of coercion and punishment which now exists; and to observe how small a modicum of common sense has ever been allowed to enter into their fabric. Except the administration of our civil laws, (the heaviest evil that ever weighed down a country,—made the rich poor, and of the poor grinded the faces to the earth,) there could not be exhibited a grosser composition of folly and cruelty than the criminal code of England. In both, the feudal deformities of their origin have been fondly preserved and cherished; and the worst principles of the darkest ages have been patched by miscalled improvements, which only made them worse than the worst-till our statutes, our precedents, our practice, our entire legislation, have become one vast mass of confusion, uncertainty, and absurdity, and the nation is Law-ridden to an extent of oppression which, when we boast of being civilised and enlightened, ought to fill us with shame and contrition.

The anomalies perpetuated, and the enormi ties committed, under the forms of law, would disgrace a tribe of ignorant barbarians in Central Africa. There is no rank or class of the community exempt from their ruinous influence. The peer and the landlord are in the chains of the agent and attorney; the merchant and manufacturer, the farmer, the shopkeeper, the respectable artisan,—all the middle and valuable portion of the state, are more or less enclosed within the same sweeping net ; -- if fortunate, taxed in a hundred odious shapes; and if unfortunate, crushed into utter misery by the tyranny of the laws and the insatiable extortions of its ministers-from the full-fee'd counsel and sinecure official, to the lowest harpy of the multitude who prey upon their fellow-creatures. Nor do the still lower orders escape. Where there is one drop of blood to be extracted from wasted nature, there will the vampire suck; where there is one coin to be squeezed from penury and wretchedness, there will the legal vampire be found inflicting the last pang upon exhausted industry. One's very flesh crawls at the thoughts of the inhumanity thus in the most extensive and perpetual operation; founded on had passions,—and instead of affording protection to society, levying a fund, of prodigious amount, for the luxurious support of a single unproductive class, upon the wants and the distresses of the whole. Cast a glance at exhausted industry. One's very flesh crawls at into objects of charity, and it is really dreadful to ascertain how much of suffering is endured in the name of law; from the miserable captive ter to Earl Grey. To which are appended for a debt of forty shillings, to the struggling Two Articles on Transportation to New South citizen, who, in spite of every honest endeavour, Wales, and on Secondary Punishments; and which would otherwise save and restore him to usefulness and comfort, is being plunged into the same abyss, bankrupt and broken-hearted.* When we know that no day passes without its hundreds of cases of this description; that no lawyer lives but at the expense of this widespread devastation,—every individual instance carrying loss and wreck into the sphere or circle with which it is connected; that the laws sanction, encourage, and afford means for perpetrating these outrages, at war with human feelings and in defiance of professed Christianity; we are tempted to believe that a pure despotism, or a state of savage independence, would be far more consistent with the enjoyment of our species, in any region of the habitable earth. Happy would it be for Great Britain were all her reforms and improvements postponed to a simplification of her legal system in every branch; so that it might be made a blessing, instead of the most grievous burden and curse to her oppressed population.

The Archbishop of Dublin directs his observations chiefly to the administration of criminal justice, and the penalties awarded to offences which are not capital. His Grace's views are clear and judicious. He points out several of the imperfections and absurdities which disfigure our mode of proceeding, and suggests the trial of other courses, where the present so obviously fail. It is demonstrated that transportation is a very inefficient punishment, and liable to insuperable objections. It is most costly to the government: when it is substituted for the sentence of death, the escape from the greater evil renders it, comparatively, a source of gratulation to the guilty; distance brightens its terrors into hopes; and thus it neither acts in deterring from crime in the individual, nor as a warning to others. The hulks do not doom a convict to greater hardship than is experienced by every honest labourer in the kingdom; and he is better fed than most of them. Instead of these, a severe penitentiary system is recommended, on an equal scale throughout the coun-Various plans might be tried, and that which worked the best be finally adopted; but the principal ingredients in all ought to be much of solitude, (not long-protracted solitary confinement,) and plenty of employment. No idleness, no talkative intercommunication; but moral and religious instruction, and some ultimate interest in the produce of their own dili-gence and good conduct. "It is from the

our prisons, or live in the busy world, or inquire | United States that the most extensive experience on this subject is to be derived; where a system has been adopted which combines solitary confinement at night, hard labour by day, the strict observance of silence, and attention to moral and religious improvement. These plans are enforced with great success at the prisons at Auburn and Sing-Sing, in the State of New York, and at Weathersfield, in the state of Connecticut. At sunrise the convicts proceed in regular order to the several workshops, where they remain under vigilant superintendence until the hour of breakfast, when they repair to the common hall. When at their meals the prisoners are seated at tables in single rows, with their backs towards the centre, so that there can be no interchange of signs. From one end of the workrooms to the other, upwards of 500 convicts may be seen without a single individual being observed to turn his head towards a visitor. Not a whisper is heard through. out the apartments. At the close of day, labour is suspended, and the prisoners return in mili-tary order to their solitary cells; there they have the opportunity of reading the Scriptures, and of reflecting in silence on their past lives. The chaplain occasionally visits the cells, instructing the ignorant, and administering the reproofs and consolations of religion. The influence of these visits is described to be most beneficial; and the effect of the entire discipline is decidedly successful in the prevention of crime, both by the dread which the imprisonment inspires, as well as by the reformation of the offender. Inquiries have been instituted relative to the conduct of prisoners released from the Auburn penitentiary—the prison at which this system has been longest observed -and of 206 discharged, who have been watched over for the space of three years, 146 have been reclaimed and maintained reputable characters in society."

As far as our judgment enables us to go, we entirely agree with the author in his opinions upon these matters; but we would still more emphatically wish to enforce the expediency of giving prisoners a decided personal contingent interest in the proceeds of their labour. would make both their immediate treatment, to a certain degree, and their future prospects, depend upon the habits of industry which they practised while undergoing the sentence to which their misdeeds had exposed them. They should see that if dissoluteness and vice brought them to detection and punishment, so should diligence and repentance fit them the sooner for restoration to society, and that best kind of restoration which was accompanied by a portion of what they had earned, to preserve them from temptation in entering upon their new course of life, and strengthening them against a relapse into crime. A slave in the West Indies is enabled to accumulate a sum by his toil at extra hours, wherewith to purchase his freedom; why should not the European, who has been the slave of sin, but affords fair testimony that he will turn from the evil of his ways, be in like manner encouraged in his laudable resolution, by having a participation in the fruits of his amended character held out to his future hopes?

This would seem like wisdom: not the wisdom which consists in a silly desire to make gaols as snug and agreeable as well-arranged domestic residences. "Of the errors (says our author) which I have said we ought, in all cases, watchfully to guard against, there is none into which zealous philanthropists are more likely to fall, than that of studying too much the comfort of those sentenced to imprisonment for their offences. When, indeed, a man is committed to prison for trial, every comfort and indulgence, consistent with his safe custody, ought to be allowed him. But when imprisonment is the allotted punishment to a criminal, it is plain that it ought to be a punishment. It might seem, in the abstract, mere trifling to insist on this; but it is found, in practice, that several circumstances tend to keep it out of sight. First, the plea of humanity is so specious, as often to be insincerely resorted to by popular declaimers, for the sake of recommending themselves to the unthinking multitude: secondly, the feelings of real humanity will often blind the understanding, and bias the judgment, of the unreflecting: and thirdly, ignorance of the habits and modes of life of the labouring classes, is liable to deceive one who is inexperienced as to what their comforts and discomforts consist in. Humanity in punishment, i. s. care to avoid the infliction of any useless suffering, is one of the points which I have mentioned as claiming our attention:

but though no one can have, strictly speaking. too much humanity, it is very possible to be led by an injudicious and misdirected humanity. Neither compassion, we should remember, nor any other feeling of our nature, is, in itself, either virtuous or vicious, but only so far as it is or is not under the control of sound principle, and under the guidance of right reason. But the word 'humanity,' being applied loosely and indiscriminately to the feeling, and to the virtue, leads, in many cases, to such conduct as is absurd and pernicious. Those who act from feeling, and not from principle, are usually led to shew more tenderness towards the offending than the unoffending: i. e. towards the culprit, who is present, and the object of their senses, and whose sufferings or apprehensions they actually witness, than the absent, unknown, and undefined members of the community. whose persons or property have been en-dangered by him. We feel for an individual, especially if before our eyes, even though guilty: for the public no one has, or can have, any feeling. Public spirit, therefore, implies a benevolent habit; and that combined with something of reflective abstraction. No doubt, every kind and degree of suffering which has no tendency either to deter offenders, or to reclaim them, or which exceeds the benefit thus produced, is so much pure evil, which we should sedulously guard against. But the infliction of such punishments as are indispensably necessary to repress crime, is the truest humanity. In fact, if it were our business merely to make punishments as little disagreeable as we can, and to study the comfort of those sentenced to imprisonment, ... if it were this, and only this that humanity requires of us, it would be a much shorter and easier plan to pull down the prisons at once, and abolish our criminal laws altogether."

False humanity, like religious cant, is indeed the greatest foe to the real welfare of body and soul. The spurious not only does evil itself, but it causes the true to be suspected, and weakens its beneficial influence. Besides the injurious effects which the Archbishop has so plainly and ably pointed out in the management and discipline of prisons, this morbid sentiment has, perhaps, a still more generally baneful operation when it prompts to error in legislating. It is here that the pseudo-philanthropist does the greatest mischief, with his sensibilities for guilt, and his compassion for crime. It is here that we find him in his element of lamentation, denouncing the cell and the scourge as unjustifiable tortures; privation as a cruel inroad upon individual right; the tread-mill as a tyranny; and the gallows as a murder. He, forsooth, would frame the laws upon a higher principle than brute force and ignominious correction. He would legislate for the moral feelings of men, -not as if they were ignorant, and vicious, and wicked; but as if they were enlightened, and well-principled, and virtuous! His laws would be for good men, instead of bad; and if mankind were what he chooses to consider them, he seems to forget that there would be no occasion for his penal enactments at all. What so justly says Archbishop Whately:

" In fact, although no one considers the brute animals as moral agents, every one is well aware that it is possible to operate on them through the fear of punishment. It is not reckoned a useless cruelty, or an absurdity, to attempt to teach a dog, by beating, to abstain from worrying sheep. Any one, therefore, who, well knowing that irrational animals can be trained, by fear of punishment, to check their impulses, yet would proclaim impunity to any man who may be, partially or wholly, reduced to the state of an irrational animal such a one plainly shews that he is allowing his views to be influenced by irrelevant considerations. But in respect of the punishment, not only of the supposed insane, and of juvenile delinquents, but of offenders generally, there is affoat in the world much false (not a little of it, I suspect, affected) tenderness. Merely excessive and misplaced compassion is, indeed, an error as much to be respected as any error can be; but when compassion is withheld from the deserving, and bestowed only on the undeserving, the error is as odious as it is practically noxious. It seems to me one of the worst and most barbarian features of the character of a great part of the nation, that, by the multitude at least, very little sympathy, comparatively, is felt, except for the guilty. The sufferings inflicted by the hand of justice ought, indeed, not to be excessive - that is, beyond what the object calls for; and they are, at all events, to be deplored, since suffering is in itself an evil: but that these should be alone or chiefly pitied, by those who are comparatively callous to the sufferings from lawless outrage, or apprehended outrage, denotes a most disgraceful and a most dangerous state of the public mind. It is said that in Corsica, and in several of the Italian states, while it is hardly possible, by the offer of any amount of pay, to induce a native to accept the office of public executioner, nothing is more easy than to hire, at a moderate price, men who will be ready, at their employer's bidding, to assassinate any one he may point out. I hardly know how far we are in a condition to exult in our own superior state of society, when I recollect the strong sympathy that was manifested, or feigned, for the incendiaries and rioters in various parts of the country, and particularly at Bristol—the exertions that were made to save them from punishment - the commiseration expressed for any of them that suffered it-and the indignation and contempt lavished on soldiers, officers of justice, and all who were concerned in suppressing violations of the law-contrasted with the indifference manifested to the suffering of those who were threatened, harassed, plundered, burnt out of their houses, deprived of their subsistence, and sometimes of their lives; and who had, in most instances, every possible claim to the sympathy of their countrymen, except the one, as it seems, most essential claim, of being criminals. And yet I am persuaded that the losses and injuries actually inflicted in these outrages, great as they were - and much the greater, doubtless, on account of the encouragement which public sympathy afforded to the perpetrators—all these, I conceive, constitute but a small fraction of the real evil. "He who does an injury to one," says the Latin proverb, "threatens it to many." The sense of insecurity produced by every crime that is committed, is by far its worst result; because uneasiness or distress of mind, from perpetual apprehension, though a less evil in each single

* "Multis minatur qui uni facit injuriam."

The Archbishop's plan is, "That of requiring, of such criminals as are sentenced to hard labour, a certain amount of work; compelling them, indeed, to a certain moderate quantity of daily labour, but permitting them to exceed this as much as they please; and thus to shorten the term of their imprisonment, by accomplishing the total amount of their task in a less time than that to which they had been sentenced. I would also allow them, for a certain portion of the work done, a payment in money,—not to be expended during their continuance in prison, but to be paid over to them at their discharge; so that they should never be turned loose into the world entirely destitute. My object in this would be, to superadd to the habit of labour, which it is the object of most penitum-trairies to create, an association not merely of the ideas of disgrace and coercion with crime, but also of freedom and independence with that of labour. It seems to me perfectly reasonable, that those whose miscouduct compels us to send them to a house of correction, should not be again let loose on society till they shall have given some indication of amended character. Instead of being sentenced, therefore, to confinement for a certain specified indication or amended character. Instead or being sentenced, therefore, to confinement for a certain fixed time, they should be sentenced to earn, at a certain specified employment, such a sum of money as may be judged sufficient to preserve them, on their release, from the pressure of immediate distress: and orderly, decent, submissive behavlour, during the time of their being thus employed, should be enforced, under the penalty (besides others, if found necessary,) of a proportionate deduction from their wages, and consequent prolongation of their confinement.
It may be said that all these regulations would require much integrity, vigilance, and discretion in the superintendents of such an establishment. This is true; hut, after all, how can such a requisition be avoided? How much is left, and must necessarily be left, to the discretion (or indiscretion) of those who have the management of convicts! And when we do not select to fill the office, persons whose activity, uprightness, and good sense, can be relied on, what mischievous consequences unavoidably ensue! In respect of the kind of labour in which it may be thought advisable that convicts should be employed, I would suggest, that though it is in titleff very desirable that it should be profitable enough to go some considerable ensue! In respect of the kind of labour in which it may be thought advisable that convicts should be employed, I would suggest, that though it is in itself very desirable that it should be profitable enough to go some considerable way in defraying the expense of their maintenance, this is by no means a point of so much importance as many others, to which accordingly we should be always ready to sacrifice it. The best-conducted of the American penientiaries are said to defray fully all their own expenses from the proceeds of the prisoners' labour. This, I conceive, cannot be expected in any country which does not combine, to such an extraordinary degree as America, the advantages of a very high value of labour and cheapness of provisions. But even if this, or something nearly approaching to it, could be attained, I should still say that it is an object of far less consequence than the moral improvement of the offenders, or, still more, the prevention of crime by the apprehension of punishment. That a penalty should be formidable, is, as I have said, decidedly the first point to be looked to; that it should be corrective, is another point of great, though far inferior, consequence; that it should be sconomical, is (though by no means insignificant) a matter of only a third-rate importance."

[•] We observe that a writer in the Morning Herald charges the author with being an advocate for the gibbet; but we are sure that independent and respectable journal (with whose opinions, where humanity is interested, we almost always agree very cordially) would not say so, had it bestowed due consideration on this volume. To us it appears to support altogether opposite sentiments, and to recommend courses which would tend more to bring the gallows into disuse than any other method of legislation whatsoever.

dreaded, is an evil which extends to many thousand times more. But for this, even the crime of murder would be but a comparatively insignificant evil; for there is hardly any country in which the whole number of persons murdered annually constitutes more than a very trifling portion of the total number of deaths. But the apprehension of being mardered — the feeling that one is in continual peril from the hand of the assassin is one of the most intolerable evils that man can be exposed to. Any one who will but sufficiently reflect on the sleepless and anxious nights, the harassing anxiety, the distressing slams, the restless and troublesome precautions in short, all the evils implied in a feeling of insecurity, which are inflicted on thousands for every crime actually perpetrated will be convinced that that person is more truly and properly compassionate (to waive all other considerations), who sets himself to devise means for the protection of the unoffending, than he whose kindly feelings are bestowed chiefly on the violators of the law. And yet the former must prepare himself to expect from the unthinking (who are, in most places, the majority) to be censured as hardhearted. In pleading the cause of the innocent, in opposition to the guilty—in urging the claims to protection of the peaceable and inoffensive citizen, against the lawless plunderer or incendiary—and in wishing that honest men may be relieved from the misery of perpetual terror, by transferring that terror to the evil-doer, I am sensible that I expose myself (such is the strangely perverted state of many men's feelings) to the charge of inhumanity. To effect this object, to prevent crime, as far as can be done, by denunciation of punishment,—the most effectual method, if we will listen either to reason or to experience, we cannot doubt must be, not to trust to the severity of the punishments which are threatened merely, and seldom inflicted; but to establish 24 close a connexion as we are able between the ideas of crime and punishment. We cannot, indeed, make sure of punishing every offender: if we could, we might hope, that, with a very moderate degree of severity, there would soon be no more to punish: but it should be our object to approach as near to this point as we can; -- to let as few as possible escape with impunity; and especially to check, by timely chastisement, the young and the unpractised delinquents, at their first entrance on a course of crime."

On the subject of the mistaken indulgence so often shewn to first offences, we also most cordially concur with the author, who puts it in its true light when he says-

That a scale of punishment, indeed, rising in severity on each repetition of an offence, should (not at the discretion of the magistrates, but by the laws) be provided, is reasonable and desirable; but that absolute impunity, or such a mitigation of punishment as nearly amounts to this, should be held out to 'first offences,' tends, I am convinced, very greatly to increase the number of second and third offences, and the amount of punishments we are ultimately obliged to inflict. In fact, next to the abolition of all penal law, I can hardly conceive any system better calculated to train boys and men gradually to crime. Every one, it should be remembered, hopes, when he violates the laws, to escape conviction; if, in addition to this, we back the temptations to crime by a prospect every reason to expect that, by the time this is less. But if the temptation they are exposed case than the actual occurrence of what is first conviction has taken place, he will have to from the instigation of their elders is strong, become too much hardened in iniquity to be it needs the more to be counterbalanced by the subsequently affected by the fear of punishment, except in using all the artifice and caution his experience will have taught him, in contriving to escape detection. For this, also, should be kept in mind, that the plea of a 'first offence' is generally urged and admitted without any ground. It is urged on the occasion of a first conviction; which, we may be assured, by no means implies a first offence. The mischief would be immensely diminished, if the plea were then only admitted when the culprit was able to prove a negative, and to establish satisfactorily that he really never had offended before. But, even in that case, I should appeal to the proverb, 'C'est le premier pas qui coûte.' A man is much more easily deterred by fear of punishment, or by any other motive, from the first offence, than from any subsequent one: and, next to this, his best chance is, to have the association established in his mind between crime and suffering, by his having been so fortunate as to have been convicted and punished for his very first transgression. It is said that those who train young dogs to attack foxes, badgers, and other such vermin, are anxious that they should not be severely bitten in their earliest attempts, which might have the effect of daunting their spirit for ever: they accordingly muzzle or otherwise disable the beast which the dogs are first set at; and when they have acquired the habit of attacking it, without having formed an association of pain and danger, they will afterwards not be deterred by the wounds they may receive. Now, it appears to me, that to hold out impunity to the young and to first offenders, and thus, as it were, to muzzle the law, till they shall have acquired the habit of defying it, is precisely an analogous kind of training, and just what is best suited to breed up hardened criminals. I am inclined to think that in this, and in many other points, important practical errors may be traced to the very prevailing mistake of confounding together two perfectly distinct considerations: the moral guilt of an offender, and the propriety of punishing him for the sake of example. The theory of punishment, indeed, viz. that it is inflicted for prevention, and not for retribution, is, in the abstract, understood and admitted by almost every one, and is distinctly recognised in our legal enactments. But in particular cases there are notions and practices inconsistent with a doctrine so evident, which are by no means uncommon. Irrelevant considerations, irrelevant, I mean, on the supposition, whose truth almost every one admits, that man has no right to think of inflicting vengeance,-are perpetually allowed to influence our judgment. To this, principally, I am inclined to trace the tendency to leave unpunished the offences of the young, and of all others who may be proved, or may be supposed, to have been seduced and incited by others to the commission of crimes. Undoubtedly the instigator to crime ought, if he can be brought to justice, to be punished more severely than those led by him; because the public good more particularly requires that an example should be made of such a character. But I suspect that even when this, which is the right course, is pursued, it is often on a wrong principle; i.e. from the consideration of the greater moral turpitude of him who seduces others. And the leniency often injudiciously shewn towards youths, and towards any who are supposed to be the seduced, and the instruments of others, arises, I conceive, chiefly from of impunity on the first conviction, we have the idea that their fault, in a moral point of view, fear of punishment. Morally speaking, the strength of temptations from bad education and habits, bad associates, strong passions, ignorance, distressed circumstances, favourable opportunities for crime, &c. may be taken into account as palliations of an offence; but if we make allowance for them, politically, as palliatives in the eye of the law, we are encouraging crime, by adding, to all these other incentives, the promise of impunity, and withdrawing the salutary check of fear precisely in the very cases where it is the most needed."

After what we have quoted, we need not insist on the truism; that prevention is the only and the true end of all punishment; what cannot be referred to this single principle is altogether extraneous and wrong, either in legislation or in the execution of the laws: and this principle is most hurtfully counteracted by the lottery that exists as to the fate of convicts. One man is hanged this year at one place, for that for which another is transported; and, perhaps, at the next assize the same crime is thought to be sufficiently repressed by a twelvemonth's hard labour on the tread-mill. This uncertainty pervades the whole system; and so long as the dispositions of mankind are sanguine, so long will it operate as a premium upon the commission of crime. Every chance of palliation and escape is the mother of a frightful progeny of theft, robbery, and murder.

There is one part of the author's reasoning, that upon public executions,—where, though we cannot help agreeing with his premises, we cannot come to his conclusion. The taking away of human life is a dreadful act; and, to us, it has always appeared that the very mockery with which it is accompanied in our hangings, is one of the most extraordinary insults that could be offered to social man. The civilisation of executions (if we may so express the sense we entertain of the various improvements made in our usual mode of capital punishment_very much resembling the so-called improvements made in the old laws) is a monstrous alliance of the ludicrous with the tragical. A lampoon it is; a warning it is not. Of old, the ruffian power strung up its victims, in agony, to the first tree in the forest; and men were appalled, if they were not restrained. Now, the solemn ceremony is but a sad farce, in which but one actor is seriously concerned: for the rest, they are the scene-shifters; and the spectators are,—what are they? a few, the merely curious, are disgusted; the majority, old or incipient candidates for the same order of martyrdom, are confirmed in the glory of dying game, "should they be so unfortunate as for to be detected."

Still, we cannot bring our minds to the conclusion, that execution should be done in prison, and without public witnessing. As for the shocking folly of criminals being sainted through the halter, - dying converts assured of eternal felicity by the delusive workings of enthusiasts and enthusiasm, and thus alluring hosts of brother-felons to a brighter world through a similar purgatory,—it is only another proof, that while we brag ourselves enlight-ened, we are but shallow. Should we be better if we adopted a piece of advice contained in the volume under review?

"I will take the liberty (says the Archbishop) of most earnestly recommending the appointment of a board of commissioners, analogous to that which is now occupied with the no less important subject of the poor-laws, and from whose labours every one, who is ac-composing it, must hope for the most favourable results. Whether the legislature is constituted in one way or in another, it is clearly impossible that it should be capable of going through, with proper care, all the necessary details of that vast and heterogeneous mass of business which belongs to its decision. And those who are at all acquainted with parliamentary proceedings, have no need to be reminded how much slovenly legislation has resulted from the non-adoption, or very slight and imperfect adoption, in the highest department of all, of that important principle, division of labour; but for which, even the humblest arts could never have been brought to any degree of perfection. Let the task of minute investigation, and uninterrupted reflection, on each subject separately, be entrusted to a small number of by the non-appliance of such common-sense competent persons, expressly selected for the purpose; and let the legislature examine and judge of the result of their labours,—adopting, action? Innumerable schemes are propounded, rejecting, or modifying their suggestions as it may see best; and I am much mistaken if a striking effect will not be produced in the increased wisdom of its enactments, in all departments in which such a procedure shall have been adopted. I will not presume to point out in full detail what should be the points, relative to the present subject, to be laid before such a board of commissioners as I have proposed; but I would suggest that they should not be too strictly confined to their own proper subject of secondary punishment; because, in respect of, first, capital punishments, and secondly, police regulations, it is possible that many facts might be ascertained, and many improvements in our present practice suggested, which might, in various ways, materially modify our practical conclusions in respect of secondary punishments. Every thing, for example, that in any way conduces to the increase or diminution of crime, must have an important bearing on the question as to the more or less extensive scale on which it may be requisite that penitentiaries should be established."

This is, perhaps, for so multifarious and important a topic, a rather crude suggestion; but in spirit it is one of unbounded interest. It is lamentable to see the time and energies of the legislature - composed of many of the most intelligent, best-informed, and finest minds in the world _wasted on trivial subjects; and if directed to matters of consequence, rarely or never brought to bear upon them so as to come to any practical conclusion and improve the common condition. The results are nonsense-committees, desultory reports never acted upon, and crude statutes encumbering the encumbered code with more needless contradictions. Ministers, and peers, and members of parliament, are so engrossed with a multiplicity of concerns, that even the most assiduous and devoted of them (not to mention the many whom pleasures and other pursuits occupy) are incapable of giving due attention to the most vital question which could demand the whole mind of a statesman. Their lives are the bustle of the chandler on a loftier scale. But what is the remedy? We would go a step, perhaps more, beyond the hint thrown out by our author; and in putting ourselves before our readers, we only beg them to re-member, that our theories are not offered as plans to be defended to the uttermost, but as a sort of embodying of ideas, to render them tangible, for approval or rejection.

The official duties of ministers are more to the happiness of their descendants. than they can perform; the labours devolved upon all public men much more than they could possibly attend to, supposing they gave every moment of their time to the public, and not one thought to their private affairs. Is it any wonder, then, that our laws should be corrupt and oppressive, and the whole administration of the state a chance-medley, rather than an example of organised wisdom? Is it any wonder, that in almost every part of our system to which we can turn our eyes, we are astonished by the prevalence of such positive evils, and more astonished but they might as well be bad as good; for no is the most drudging, unenjoying, discontented, and, throughout the great mass of the lower earth. pauper in five hundred of the population, there are more paupers than independent persons. We know not: it may be the fault of the parmight be largely remedied, so that neither the inclination nor the power to live in idle beggary and starvation should afflict the land.

We hire ministers to conduct our political to administer our laws; but we have no specific charge and jurisdiction to look to and provide for the welfare of the poor. secretary of state for the home department is embarrassed with a multitude of other concerns; and the grand consideration of the condition of one-fourth of the people is left to parish officers. We have commissioners of bankrupts, of customs, of excise, and directors and inspectors of every possible interest; but there are no guardians of this vast aggregate of human life and capability.

Tribunes of the People might be ominous and dangerous; but might we not institute a permanent body to investigate and ameliorate sums are given to every partial scheme which be done, say for a Board whose duties should be poor upon a universal principle, instead of conflicting local mal-administrations. We are firmly persuaded, that by some such institution as this the poor-rates might be lowered onehalf; and the poor, the infirm, the aged, and the helpless, be raised in the scale of society to a degree which would greatly diminish both misery and crime. We will go farther: by the allotment of small portions of land, and other means of competition and industry, judiciously adopted, we are persuaded that contentment and happiness would speedily be seen quainted with the character of the individuals framed for the good of the people. It is, truly, and suffering. Our Saxon ancestors worship-composing it, must hope for the most favourable according to what is understood, the business ped an idol, or god, called Ermensewl, the of all; but we need not add that every Friend and Supporter of the poor: in a human body's business is nobody's business. And so it form, such a protector might contribute much

They detail the many adventures of a young scapegrace, who has the benefit of all Mr. Inglis's Spanish experience; and Pedro of Penaflor connects sketches of manners, dramatised anecdotes, narratives, &c. Take, for example, the following:—

> Modern Miracle.—" Thy name, I think, is

Fernando,' said one of the friars to me one day, leading me into the cloisters, as I was passing out from dinner. 'Fernando is my name,' said I, 'and my name is all my inheritance.' one decides, no one adopts. Partial efforts 'Thou art poor, no doubt,' rejoined he; 'but operate partially for a season; but the gloomy I design that thou shalt soon be richer, if thou 'Thou art poor, no doubt,' rejoined he; 'but end of all is, that this country, blessed with wilt consent to obey my instructions.' 'No freedom, with activity and intelligence in the one,' said I, 'can be readier to obey instrucpeople, with great wealth, with all natural tions that are to produce so agreeable a remeans of abundance, with exemption from the sult;' and the friar then explained to me how sufferings to which other nations are exposed that the finances of the convent were miserably when war disturbs the globe, with long-tried low-that a new organ for the chapel and and well-understood principles of government, many ornaments for the major altar were wanted; and that on the occasion of the approaching festival, when it was always the orders, the most wretched upon the face of the custom for the devout to lay some little offering Where there ought not to be one upon the altar of the saint, it was intended to warm devotion by some striking display of the saint's gratitude: and, finally, I was made to understand, that if I would consent to personate ties in many a case; but sure we are that it the saint, by wearing his garments and crown -to hold a silver salver in my hand to receive the offerings, and to bow my head whenever the donation exceeded a duro-I should be rewarded with a thousand reals; but upon conaffairs, and chancellors and judges at vast cost dition that I should immediately afterwards quit Valencia, and reside in some other town. * Upon the day appointed for the celebra-The tion of the festival, I was received by the superior, whom I found to be the same individual who had formerly spoken with me, and who, with two or three others, was alone in the secret of the pious fraud in which I was to be an actor. 'By this,' said he, 'we confirm the wavering and strengthen the faith of the true Catholic,—and thus the end justifies the means.'
The habiliments of the saint were ample; and the image having been removed, I easily slipped into its place, divesting myself only of my cloak, and found room enough within the foldings of the cloth of gold that covered my this essential part of our national being? Vast tarnished dress: the crown was placed upon my head, a well-contrived mask upon my face, short-sighted patriotism or an ambition for and a massive silver salver in my hand, which, popularity suggests; surely something might somehow or other, seemed to grow to my fingers. Thus prepared, the chapel railing was to protect the lower orders, and succour the thrown open, and the matin-bell began to chime. And now the devout Valencians poured in, and a silver-gilded canopy. The wants of the convent had been industriously circulated by the friars: nor had less pains been taken to encourage a belief that some visible manifestation of the saint's good will and gratitude might be expected. The first that entered were some beggars, with little more than their tattered brown cloaks to cover them, and a few quartos dropped upon the salver; larger offerings succeeded-pesetas, half and whole duros; but no We would say, therefore, that in all our to a large extent, where there is nothing now sign of gratitude or good will yet escaped from government, there is no branch expressly but poverty and sorrow, the parents of guilt the saint. At length a gold piece rung upon the salver, and forthwith the saint bent his sited on the previous night in the great vaults feel that the prospect of laying my bones elsehead. The miracle was seen by all: a thousand that lie underneath the Alcazar, in order that thumbs had in an instant performed the sign of the cross; a thousand knees were bent; a loud and earnest hum of prayer rose from a thousand kneelers; at the same instant the ergan pealed forth its loud anthem, and 'Glory to God, glory in the highest,' was the universal song of praise. But the miracle operated in a more substantial form; the prediction of an influential saint was well worth the sacrifice of a few duros-gold poured into the salver; and to such an extent, that not only was the saint's neck weary of acknowledgment, and his arm of the weight with which devotion burdened it but a new miracle became necessary; the salver was too small to contain its offerings, and the gold was beginning to slide off the heap: the saint, therefore, withdrawing the salver, deposited the contents somewhere within the folds of his under-garments, and again extended the vessel to the awe struck devotees. The throng that had poured into the chapel at length began to lessen; and mass having begun at the major altar, all hastened to place themselves before it: so that the chapel of the miraculous image was left for a time without a worshipper. Now, thought I, is the moment: slipping my arms out of the wide sleeves of the saint, I disentangled myself from the cumbrous garments, which were stiff enough to stand erect without the help either of an image or its representative; the mask I left propped in its place, and the salver also I would have left in the hand of the saint, had this been possible: but I was compelled to dispose of it otherwiseit followed its contents within my girdle; and having stealthily descended from the canopy, I threw my old cloak, which I had laid behind it. over my shoulders, and drawing my hat over my brows, I walked leisurely out of the chapel, and through the church, and soon found myself in the Calle de Alboraya, and crossing the bridge of the Holy Trinity. What took place in the convent when mass was ended, at what time the discovery was made, or what steps were taken to trace the flight of the mock saint, I have no means of ascertaining, and never stopped to inquire; but satisfied that I had practised a less fraud upon the friars than they had practised upon the people, I continued my walk at no unusual pace, that I might avoid suspicion, along the avenue that leads to the port - engaged, like others, in leisurely cutting up a melon, and eating it by Penance and its motives .- " In front of the gate of the Dominican convent was affixed a paper, which all were reading, or endeavouring to read. It was the publication of an indulgence of no fewer than five hundred days to all such persons as being secretly conscious of any sin, should appear the following day in the character and dress of penitents, at the execution of two robbers, which was then to take place. This was an indulgence not difficult to purchase; for with the long cloak and mask of the penitent, the penance might be as secret as the sin; and many blessings were accordingly showered upon the head of the considerate archbishop, who had by the publication of this indulgence, helped so many on their way to heaven. And in another way besides disguise, the reputation of the penitent was secured :no fewer than five hundred cloaks, masks, caps, and wands, were provided by the archbishon for the use of penitents-so indifferent an opinion did the archbishop entertain of the morality of the city of Toledo; and it was moreover made known that these were to be deposithough I be, I am not yet tired of life; and I such penitent sinners as resolved to take advantage of the opportunity, might avoid the calumny of issuing from their own doors dressed in the penitential garb. * * * 'Alas!' said he whose turn it was to speak the next. happy are those whose crimes are so venial as to have been atoned by the penitence of this day. As for my sin, I greatly fear that the five hundred days, which to others have almost opened the gates of heaven, will scarcely be felt by me as any mitigation of my penalty. This, senores, is the crime that has brought me hither :- I am a vender of fruits and vegetables, which I rear in a garden of my own on the banks of the Tagus; and every morning I take my place in the Plaza Real, and lay out my fruit and vegetables. I have no reason to tell you, señores, that every morning a friar from each of the five convents of Franciscans. and from each of the four convents of Canuchins, and from the two convents of Augustins. walks through the market-place and asks supplies for his convent, for the love of God. One gives a cabbage, another tomata, a third garbauzos, a fourth a melon, a fifth grapes; and every one picks the best for the use of the convent, knowing well the blessing that will return to the giver: but as for me, before I take my place in the market I carefully examine my fruits and vegetables-not that I may pick out the best for the convents, but that I may lay aside for the friars whatever worm-eaten cabbages, or useless melons, or shrivelled grapes, I can find in my baskets. Never, during fifteen vears that I have sat in the market-place of Toledo, have the convents been one real the better for me : and vet no one of all the marketpeople that own a stall there, enjoys so high a reputation as I do. 'Ah! the good Pascual,' says one, 'he never forgets to toss a cabbage into the friar's sack.' The devout Pascual, says another, 'his gift is always readv.' true friend to the convents is Pascual,' says a third. 'Many's the doblon he has given away in choice melons to feed the monks.' A sad score, señores, I have run up against me; and no wonder it hangs heavy upon my mind, and that the offer of the archbishop was not thrown away upon me: and such, senores, is the history of my penitence."

Beau ideal of a beggar: Pablo is refusing to go to Madrid :- " I dreamt all the long night of Toledo: and though, God knows, I have no home there to call my own, I have a home every where. There's scarce a street, señor, but what seems half my own; the Plaza Real -the court of the cathedral-the steps of the archbishop's palace—the vaults of the Alcazar -are all so many homes to me: every one knew me, and I knew every body. 'Well, Pablo!' said a canon; 'How fares it with thee, Pablo?' said a prebendary; 'Good day, or good night, Pablo,' said this friar and that; There's a quarto for thee, Pablo,' said one and 'May'st thou never want a gazpacho,' said another. Every one will miss Pablo: I was a citizen of Toledo, señor, and now I am nothing and nobody! What is it to me that the king house is in Madrid, and that his coach and eight mules drives along the Prado; will that put bread into my mouth? - or that rich grandees and nobles parade on the Prado; who among them will cast a glance at Pablo? Nay, not even a friar will have a kind word for him. Ah! señor, I have not resolution for this: youth has its follies and weaknesses, and so has age. I am too old to go a wandering: poor where than in Toledo, would hasten my end."

The whole work is very amusing; but, as a connected narrative, it somewhat over-abounds in enicodes

DR. ADAM CLARKE.

A VENERABLE victim to the pestilence which is unhappily prevalent amongst us, has just fallen in the person of Dr. Adam Clarke, one of the most learned, eminent, and pious of the disciples of John Wesley. Dr. Clarke was a native of Ireland (though not of Irish parentage, for his father was, we are told, English, and his mother Scottish), the son of a schoolmaster. and brought to England by Wesley himself. when about the age of nineteen, and placed as an assistant in Kingswood Academy. He first preached at Penzance; and it is a remarkable coincidence, that the son of one of his earliest friends there. Mr. Carne, has also been suddenly cut off in the midst of his ministry by the same fatal disease.* From Penzance Dr. Clarke went to Bristol, and from Bristol came to London, where he was honorary librarian to the Surrey Institution, and the author of many most meritorious and successful publications. Besides new editions of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and Butterworth's Concordance, he gave the world, in 1797, a Dissertation on the Use and Abuse of Tobacco: Sturms' Reflections for every Day in the Year, 4 vols. 12mo, from the German: between 1802 and 1806, a Bibliographical Dictionary, in 6 vols. 12mo.; an Abridgment of Baxter's Christian Directory; and the Bibliographical Miscellany, 2 vols. But his great work is the Bible, with a commentary and notes, in eight quarto volumes. His account of the illness and death of Professor Porson was privately printed; and he wrote several papers in the Classical Journal.

Dr. Clarke was taken ill at Bayswater. whither he had come from his residence at Heydon Hall, Middlesex, to preach a sermon; and notwithstanding every medical aid, died the ensuing day. He was a good man, and universally respected. His library and collection of MSS. are of extreme importance.

We have on our table (hitherto unnoticed, but recalled to our attention by this event), the second and concluding volume of " A Concise View of the Succession of Sacred Literature, in a Chronological Arrangement of Authors and their Works, from the invention of Alphabetical Characters, to the Year of our Lord 1300."+ The author of this laborious work is a son of Dr. Adam Clarke; and the patient drudgery which he must have bestowed on hundreds of the voluminous productions of the old Fathers in order to write it, shews that he is equal to any literary task whatever. The results of his investigation, though brief, are invaluable to all who are engaged in lines of life which require this sort of information, where single paragraphs are truly the fruits of months of very dry and disheartening study. We will select a few passages for the curiosity of their statements; but every page is replete with learned and scholastic intelligence.

[•] We allude to Dr. Carne of Plymouth, whose death and that of his wife, within three days, of cholera, has created so strong a sensation among those to whom they were endeared by religious connexion and private worth. Dr. Carne was the brother of Mr. John Carne, whose literary works are so justly popular, and whose interesting Lives of Missionaries we have reviewed within the last few weeks.

thirty eastern monks, 'whose virtue he well assured cannot be adequately described. and whose wondrous deeds and endurances he his readers not hastily to disbelieve, should hear of a power beyond their ifthey own. There by any means to measure the virtue of the se men by their own.' Some of the things he relates he had himself seen, and others were relate to him by respectable witnesses who were Ettenders on the teaching of these men. The saints whose lives he relates are, James of The whose lives ne relates are, James of Nisibi who lived in the greatest deprivations and hardships, and wrought wonders wheresoever he went. Going on one of his religious visitations in Persia, he passed a fountain where some women were washing clothes by treading on them with their feet in the water, and their own clothes tucked up out of the wet: they did not cornellt the saint's delicacy by letting down their garments as he passed, and he therefore punished their immodesty by stopping the spring and turning their hair grey! The death of Arius is attributed to James's prayers .- Julianus Sabbas, who lived in a cave, fed himself once a week, and employed his whole time in singing David's Psalms: his fame soon spread, and numbers joined him in his retreat: he kills a dragon by the sign of the cross; the son of one of his female disciples, while his mother was absent, fell into a well; the ill tidings were soon conveyed to the parent, who coolly ordered the lid to be put on the well till Julianus returns, while she went on with the service in which she had been engaged: on entering, Julianus inquires for the child, that he may give him his blessing, when his mother relates the accident: the old man hastens to the well, removes the covering, orders a light, and sees the lad sitting on the top of the water dashing it about sportively with his hand; ropes are brought and the child drawn up, who related that he had seen Julianus supporting him in the water and preventing his sinking !-Marcianus, who thought it right to eat and drink only once a-day, and always to leave off both hungry and thirsty: a divinely kindled lamp burned above his head at night to enable him to read the Bible: through modesty he was very unwilling to work miracles !- Eusebius ate every fourth day, allowing his disciples to eat every other.—Publius.—Symeon sends two lions to direct a traveller in his road; and again orders off a lion which was intruding on the privacy of himself and company: indeed, lions and dragons seem to have existed only to shew the power of these ascetics .- Palladius, at whose request a murdered man sat up, and looking round, pointed out with a finger of his right hand his murderer.—Aphraates predicts the death of his abuser, who afterwards was boiled to death by falling into a hot bath: he cures the emperor's horse by holy water; and he gives holy oil to a woman to anoint her husband with to restore to her his love.

The whole of these thirty abounded in ascetic severities; but it is somewhat singular that, of the last ten who were alive, there is nothing related at all equal as a miracle to what is recorded of those who were dead. Indeed it is melancholy to see a man like Theodoret believing such absurdities, and praising such brutish lives as some of them led: the whole history is a series of ridiculous miracles, and absurd austerities; even the little piety which is glimmeringly shewn in some of their sayings is of small account; there is nothing praiseworthy in their conduct, and nothing instructive in their discourse; some of them appear to have been really very little better than the beasts they abroad, and others to have been men of most unsubdued minds and passions, in whom the smallest temptation aroused their naturally corrupt inclinations, and who scarcely had any notion of correcting the inner man, while they loaded the outer one to its destruction: the saintship of the deserts seems to have been the climax of religious fanaticism and folly." " Epitome of Heretical Fables, in five books, the four first occupied with an account of the various heretics and their heresies, and the fifth embodies the true doctrine, as an antidote against the previously recited errors. Book I. gives an account of all those heretics who imagined there were more than one universal Ruler, and asserted that our Lord only seemed to have entered this world: each heretic forms the subject of a chapter. I will mention the names and some of the peculiarities of several. He begins with Simon Magus, who said there was a certain infinite power, the root and spring of the universe, which power he himself was, being manifested to the Jews as the Son, to the Samaritans as the Father, and to all other nations as the Holy Spirit; his companion Helena he termed the first conception of his mind, the mother of all, by whom were the angels and archangels; with many other absurdities.-Menander, who affirmed that men were to be saved by being baptised unto him. Satornilus.—Basilides and Isidore.—Basilides taught a graduated chain of beings, each producing the one below him; that not Christ, but Simon the Cyrensean, suffered; he denied the resurrection.—Carpocrates and Epiphanes believed Christ to have been born naturally of Joseph and Mary, and that souls transmigrated .- Prodicus taught a community of wives, ou de xaeir, ou er rois noiveis durivois moror, to huxνιαιον φως ικποδων ποιουμινοι, ήπις αν ίκαστος ιπι-τυχι συνιμιγουτο, and several other abominations are specified, both unnatural and base.-Secundus. Mark the Wizzard, who compared the zons to the twenty-four letters of the alphabet. dividing them into mutes, vowels, and semivowels; and these, composing false and forged writings, misled the foolish.-The Ascodruti. -The Archontici. These composed books of false prophecies, one of which was entitled the Symphony, which describe the seven heavens. in the highest of which Sabaoth exercises his tyranny. - The Colorbasii .- The Barbeliotæ. These and others helped forward their absurdities by adopting barbarous and uncouth Hebrew words, which were comforting and convincing to the minds of the ignorant.-The Ophitæ held Seth to be a kind of divinity, that Jesus was born of the Virgin, but Christ came down from above; that there is no resurrection, therefore the apostles were wrong; that Christ entered the Virgin's womb in the form of a serpent; that the serpent associated with wisdom, fought with the Creator, deceived Adam, and that the convolutions of our intestines is to imitate him! They worshipped a serpent, and had songs and religious rites appointed for it. The Caïnites.—The Antitactee.—The Perate held that Christ had a threefold nature, threefold body, and threefold power !- Monoimus, who broached an arithmetical heresy !-- Hermogenes believed in the pre-existence of matter, and said that our Lord's body was laid up in the sun.-Tatian and the Hydroparastite or Encratitæ, who drank no wine nor ate animal food; they abhorred marriage. Marcion was their leader, who had formed a gospel of his own, called Diatessaron, in which he destroyed every evidence of our Lord having descended really very little better than the beasts they from David. This gospel had got into very were sometimes mistaken for when they came general use, even among the orthodox;—'I

"The Messalians, or Euchits, i.e. the Prayers,—a sect who denied the good of baptism;—'to every man born there belongs a demon who urges him to improprieties: this demon, neither baptism nor any thing else, except the power of prayer, is able to expel from the soul; and then the indwelling demon comes away in the mucus of the nose, and in the spittle! They perform many other mad pranks, for all of a sudden they leap up and boast that they are treading down the demons; with their fingers they imitate shooting, and declare that they are shooting the demons: and endless other absurdities they practise."

These quotations are only portions of the remarkable summaries which Mr. Clarke has so clearly abridged.

Salvian of Marseilles wrote "against the abominations of the theatre and public sports: he says that the Christians of his day were accustomed to celebrate the Cercensian games to the honour of Christ!!"

"Huchald, the monk, A.D. 916, of the monastery of St. Amandus, wrote a poem in praise of baldness to Charles the Bald, consisting of 300 verses: it is remarkable only for the number of o's (for calvus, bald) introduced into it. It was printed by Barthius, in his Advers. p. 2175, Francof. 1624."

"Atto, Bishop of Verceil, A.D. 945, the second of this name, was son of Aldegarius, and celebrated in his time as a most learned theologian and canonist: his works lay unpublished for a long time in the Vatican Library, till D'Achery laid them before the public in his Spicileg. vol. i. p. 402." Among them is a list containing, as prohibited, "the works of heretics and schismatics; a great number of spurious Gospels are mentioned, together with acts of martyrs, lives of saints, revelations, &c.; a most curious list, the titles of some of which are the following: Our Saviour's Infancy-Of our Lord's Birth-Of Mary and her Midwife-The Assumption of the Holy Mary—Og's Fight with the Dragon after the Deluge—The Phylacteries of the Angels; all which, with numbers more, he condemns."

Works of Lord Byron. Vol. IX. Murray. This volume introduces us to the full spring. tide of Byron's genius: the Giaour, the Bride of Abydos, the Corsair, the exquisite miscellaneous poems-all as they belong to that " one morning which woke and found itself famous." We own we shall be glad to have done with the satires: often unjust, as the whim of the moment usually is; always petulant and ill-natured to us, at least, they unidealise the writer :

"Still, when least divine He is a god, whose shrines shall be restored-Apollo's self dethroned."

It is curious to observe how the fountains of his Nile ever arose in his own feelings. first cause might be slight, but a first cause there always was. His imagination first mystified its possessor; and his own Gisour and Corsair were the picturesque of himself in action. You might as well tell the leopard to put away its spots and yet be beautiful, as to bid Byron put aside his identity and yet be poetical. In the intenseness of that egotism lay his power. The fanciful is more actual than we allow: a part of every man's life is past in thinking himself in situations in which he is never placed, and picturing to himself what he would there say and do. In proportion as the come more or less real: the faculty of making them visible to others constitutes poetry; and this faculty he possessed in the highest degree. It is because, by force of imagination, he first placed himself in the character of Conrade, &c. that he makes them seem so real to the reader The notes of this edition are very interesting; we like to see the " pains the poet takes." The following passage is proof that Byron added labour to inspiration :-

"The hundred and twenty-six lines which follow, down to ' Tell me no more of fancy's gleam, first appeared in the fifth edition. In returning the proof, Lord Byron says :have, but with some difficulty, not added any more to this snake of a poem, which has been lengthening its rattles every month. It is now fearfully long, being more than a canto and a half of 'Childe Harold.' The last lines Hodgson likes. It is not often he does; and when he don't, he tells me with great energy, and I fret and alter. I have thrown them in to soften the ferocity of our Infidel; and, for a dying man, have given him a good deal to say for himself. Do you know any body who can stop -I mean, point - commas, and so forth? for am, I hear, a sad hand at your punctuation.'
Among the Giaour MS. is the first draught of this passage, which we subjoin :-

Yes Love indeed doth spring descend from heaven; A spark of that (immortal) fire, celestial To human hearts in mercy given, To lift from earth our low desire. A feeling from the Godhead caught, To wean from self (our) sordid thought;
Devotion sends the soul above,
But heaven itself descends to love. But heaven itself descends to love.
Yet marvel not, if they who love
This present joy, this future hope,
Which taught them with all ill to cope,
In madness then, their fate accuse—
In madness do those fearful deeds
That seem { to add but guilt to } woe.
Alss! the { breast } that inly bleeds,
Has sought to dread from ontward foe," &c. Again_

"'When rubbed, the amber is susceptible of a perfume, which is slight but not disagreeable." On discovering that, in some of the early copies. the all-important monosyllable 'not' had been omitted, Lord Byron wrote to Mr. Murray,-'There is a diabolical mistake which must be corrected; it is the omission of 'not' before disagreeable, in the note on the amber rosary. This is really horrible, and nearly as bad as the stumble of mine at the threshold-I mean the misnomer of Bride. Pray do not let a copy go without the 'not;' it is nonsense, and worse than nonsense. I wish the printer was saddled with a vampire !"

"This do I for your applause, O Athenians!" has ever been the great first cause, as it ever will be, of human exertion. There is a curious coincidence between a line in Prior's Nutbrown Maid and one in Byron's Corsair. Emma's

"They came, they saw, they marvelled, and they loved. Gulnare tells the Corsair, of her own heart-" It feared thee, thanked thee, pitied, maddened, loved."

By the by, we cannot but remark how mistaken was the outcry against the Corsair's mochivalrous foe—one who disdains to purchase courage and protect wit, whosoever's property his own life by that of another, because the blow it may be. Those gentlemen who have any must be struck in secret. Byron's own last line such property are all, I hope, our friends: do is a calumny.

"Link'd with one virtue and a thousand crimes."

qualities we have enumerated above.

As the state of the drama now occupies considerable attention, we select the following from the " Hints from Horace."

"Now to the Drama let us bend our eyes, Where fettered by Whig Walpole low she lies; Corruption foiled her, for she fear'd her glance; Decorum left her for an opera dance!
Yet Chesterfield, whose polish'd pen inveighs
'Gainst laughter, fought for freedom to our plays, Uncheck'd by megrims of patrician brains, And damning dulness of lord chamberlains. Repeal that act! again let Humour roam Wild o'er the stage—we've time for tears at -we've time for tears at home: Wild o'er the stage—we've time for tears at home; Let 'Archer' plant the horns on 'Sullen's' brows, And 'Estifanla' gull her 'Copper' spouse; The moral's scant, but that may be excused—Men go not to be lectured, but amused. He whom our plays dispose to good or fill, Must wear a head in want of Willis' skill: Ay, but Macheath's example—psha l—no more! It form'd no thieves—the thief was form'd before; And, spite of Puritans and Collier's "curse, Plays make mankind no better, and no worse." Plays make mankind no better, and no worse."

"The following is a brief sketch of the origin of the Playhouse Bill:-In 1735 Sir John Barnard brought in a bill ' to restrain the number of houses for playing of interludes, and for the better regulating of common players. The minister, Sir Robert Walpole, conceiving this to be a favourable opportunity of checking the abuse of theatrical representation, proposed to insert a clause to ratify and confirm, if not enlarge, the power of the lord chamberlain in licensing plays; and at the same time insinuated, that unless this addition was made. the king would not pass it. But Sir John Barnard strongly objected to this clause; contending, that the power of that officer was already too great, and had been often wantonly exercised. He therefore withdrew his bill rather than establish by law a power in a single officer so much under the direction of the crown. In the course, however, of the session of 1737 an opportunity offered, which Sir Robert did not fail to seize. The manager of Goodman's Fields Theatre having brought to him a farce called 'The Golden Rump,' which had been proffered for exhibition, the minister paid the profits which might have accrued from the performance, and detained the copy. He then made extracts of the most exceptionable passages, abounding in profaneness, sedition, and blasphemy, read them to the house, and obtained leave to bring in a bill to limit the number of playhouses; to subject all dramatic writings to the inspection of the lord chamberlain; and to compel them to take out a license for every production before it could appear on the stage."

"Chesterfield's speech on the Licensing Act is one of his most eloquent efforts. Though the Playhouse Bill is generally said to have been warmly opposed in both houses, this speech of the Earl of Chesterfield is the only trace of that opposition to be found in the periodical publications of the times. The following passage, which relates to the powers of the lord chamberlain, will shew the style of the oration:—'The bill is not only an encroachment upon liberty, but it is likewise an encroachment on property. Wit, my lords, is a sort of property: it is the property of those who have it, and too often the only property they have to depend on. Thank God! my lords, we have a dependence of another kind; we have a much less precarious support, and therefore cannot feel the inconveniences of the a generous and humane victor, and a most bill now before us: but it is our duty to en-

imagination is developed, the circumstances be-| Now, his crimes are only hearsay, and his good | not let us subject them to any unnecessary or arbitrary restraint. I must own, I cannot easily agree to the laying of any tax upon wit; but by this bill it is to be heavily taxed, it is to be excised: for if this bill passes, it cannot be retailed in a proper way without a permit; and the lord chamberlain is to have the honour of being chief gauger, supervisor, commissioner, judge, and jury. But what is still more hard, though the poor author, - the proprietor, I should say,—cannot, perhaps, dine till he has found out and agreed with a purchaser, yet before he can propose to seek for a purchaser, he must patiently submit to have his goods rummaged at this new excise-office; where they may be detained for fourteen days, and even then he may find them returned as prohibited goods, by which his chief and best market will be for ever shut against him, without the least shadow of reason, either from the laws of his country or the laws of the stage. These hardships, this hazard, which every gentleman will be exposed to who writes any thing for the stage, must certainly prevent every man of a generous and free spirit from attempting any thing in that way; and as the stage has always been the proper channel for wit and humour, therefore, my lords, when I speak against this bill, I must think I plead the cause of wit, I plead the cause of humour, I plead the cause of the British stage, and of every gentleman of taste in the kingdom. The stage and the press, my lords, are two of our out-sentries: if we remove them, if we hoodwink them, if we throw them in fetters, the enemy may surprise us. Therefore, I must look upon the bill now before us as a step, and a most necessary step too, for introducing arbitrary power into this kingdom."

""Repeal that Act."—After the lapse of nearly a century, the state of the laws affecting dramatic literature, and the performance of the drama, has again become the subject of parliamentary inquiry."

Of the Curse of Minerva we shall only state that a manuscript copy of this little poem of four-teen pages, which Lord Byron wrote out for a friend while at Athens, was, the other day, brought to the hammer by Evans, of Pall Mall, and actually fetched sixteen pounds! "How are we revived !"

The annexed account of the other poems is curious: the editor says: "The Giaour, written in April, and published in May; the Bride of Abydos, written in November, and published early in December, 1813; and the Corsair, composed during the last thirteen days of the same month, and published in January, 1814. These vigorous performances, so rapidly following each other, kept the public attention rivetted on Lord Byron at this, the most brilliant, and, perhaps, the happiest period of his short career. He was enjoying the steady blaze of fame, and exulting in a strength which now, in general estimation, knew no rival. By a careful comparison of the original MSS. and successive editions of these splendid poems, the editor has been enabled to collect a rich harvest of various readings, many of them curious, and not a few important; and the margin continues to present a running series of historical, biographical, and critical annotations. The appendix consists of the poet's remarks on the Romaic, or modern Greek language, with specimens and translations—all produced during his residence in the Capuchin convent, at Athens, in 1811."

The engravings are, Petrarch's Tomb, by G. Cattermole, and Seville, both exquisitely engraved by E. Finden; and another interesting embellishment is given in a fac-simile of a stanza of Childe Harold, as scribbled on the Lake of Geneva, and altered by the noble bard.

The propriety of publishing Childe Harold in one volume is obvious; still, there is a wide gulf between its first and last; and we now include the two first cantos.

The Family Library, Vol. XXXIV. Scottish Worthies, Vol. II. By P. F. Tytler, Esq. 12mo. pp. 322. London, 1832. Murray. THE name of the author, one of the most able of our living historians, is a sufficient guarantee for this volume being of a superior order. It is indeed interesting in its subjects, marked by adequate research, and written with great perspicacity and spirit. The first memoir is that of King Robert Bruce, the hero of Bannockburn, against whom the second Edward led so powerful an army; after describing the component parts of which, Mr. Fraser Tytler says:"In addition to these preparations, the king, having received information that it was the intention of the Scots to draw up their army in a marshy district, where it would be difficult for cavalry to act with safety, directed a body of 21,500 infantry to be raised in England and Wales, which, in conjunction with the Irish troops, consisting of foot soldiers lightly armed. and of the light irregular cavalry called hobilers, would, it was hoped, be able to attack the Scots, even in the strongest country where they could have pitched their encampment. The original writs, the multifarious and complicated orders for the calling together the various divisions of this army, for the organisation of the victualling and forage departments, for the providing of waggons and cars to transport the tents and pavilions, and for assembling the various artisans, smiths, armourers, miners, and carpenters, who were required to supply the wants and repair the damages incident upon the march of so large a host, are still to be seen among the records of the kingdom; and they demonstrate that the force with which Edward proceeded against Scotland, amounted, at the lowest calculation, to 100,000 men."

After a life of glory, admirably painted, we come to the closing scene of this illustrious monarch's life.

" It is an affecting circumstance, that the King of Scotland had scarcely concluded this peace, which proved so signal a blessing to the nation, and brought so happy a relief to his own cares and anxieties, when that disease, contracted amidst the hardships and exposures of war, which had of late years been undermining his strength, assumed a more malignant form, and rendered it necessary for him to abstract himself entirely from public business. By the advice of his physicians, he retired to Cardross, a beautiful retreat, situated upon the Clyde, about six miles from Dumbarton; where, amid the intervals from pain and sickness, his time appears to have been much occupied in making experiments in the construction and sailing of vessels, with a view, probably, towards the establishment of a more effective naval force in Scotland. We learn this fact from the accounts of his high chamberlain, which are yet preserved; and the same records acquaint us, that in these kingly amusements he often enjoyed the society of Randolph. His lighter pleasures consisted in hunting and hawking, when his health permitted; in sailing upon the Clyde, and superintending his mariners and shipwrights in their occupations; in enlarging and palace. As even the most trivial circumstances are interesting when they regard so eminent a man, it may be mentioned that he kept a lion, the expense of whose maintenance forms an item in the chamberlain's accounts; and that his active mind, even under the pressure of increasing disease, seems to have taken an interest in the labours of the architects, painters, goldsmiths, and inferior artists, who belonged to his establishment. In compliance with the manners of the times, he maintained a fool, for whose comfort he was solicitous, and in whose society he took delight. He entertained his clergy and his barons, who visited him from time to time at his rural palace, in a style of noble and abundant hospitality. The minutest parts of his expenditure appear to have been arranged with the greatest order; and his lowest officers and servants, his huntsmen, falconers, dog-keepers, gardeners, and parkstewards, provided for in rude but regular abundance. His gifts and largesses to the officers of his household, to his nurse and other old servants, and to the most favourite amongst his nobles, were frequent and ample: his charity in the support of many indigent persons, by small annual salaries, or regular allowances of meat and flour, was extensive and welldirected; whilst a pleasing view of his genero-sity, combined with his love of letters, is pre-sented by his presents to 'poor clerks,' for the purpose of enabling them to carry on their education 'at the schools.'

" Amidst these quiet but not unkingly cares, the near approach of death was contemplated with resignation and deep expressions of repentance for the sins he had committed, and the blood which he had spilt. In compliance with the regal practice of the age, more than from any feelings of ostentation, which was foreign to the simplicity of his character, he had given orders to have a magnificent tomb made at Paris, which was brought to Bruges, thence through England into Scotland, and, on its arrival, erected in the church of the Benedictines, at Dumfermline. About a month before his death he appears to have conceived an especial affection for the monks of Melrose; and he directed a letter to his son and successor, Prince David, in which he recommends these religious men and their monastery to his care and protection with great earnestness and solicitude. He had determined also, that, at this time, his heart should be buried at Melrose, although his body was to be carried to Dumfermline. Soon after this Bruce's illness assumed an appearance which proved that its last stage could not be distant; and his principal clergy and nobles, with affectionate solicitude repaired to Cardross. At this moment that repentance for the profuse expenditure of blood during his long wars, which he had already expressed, induced him to alter his wishes for the interment of his heart at Melrose, and to resolve, with the superstitious feeling of the age, that it should be carried to Jerusalem, to be deposited in the church of the Holy Sepulchre, since the unworthy body it had animated could no longer obey its wishes and engage in war against the Infidels."

We subjoin the letter alluded to; it is very characteristic of the spirit of the age.

" Robert, by the grace of God, King of Scots. to David, his beloved son, and to his successors which shall come after him, wisheth safety, and his blessing to rest on their future reigns. Dear son, you are aware that he alone is worthy to be called a son, who, in all just things imitating power, to obey his wishes; nor does he rightly merit the name of heir, who does not adhere to the salutary desires of his predecessor. Being desirous, therefore, that you and the rest of your successors should continue to entertain, with devout respect to our memory, that sincere love and pious affection, which, being moved thereto by their most holy life, we have conceived towards the monks and the monastery of Melrose, in which, according to our special and devout injunctions, our heart is to be buried; and being the more earnest that this ardour of attachment should be shewn by you to these holy men after our decease, in order that they may be thereby animated to pray more fervently and effectually for the welfare of our soul: we therefore direct you (and to this request add our most fervent supplications and injunctions), that you will permit the same holy men to enjoy liberally, and without interruption, the rents which we have assigned to them towards the rebuilding of their church, rather, if any change is made, adding to these gifts than substracting from them, and at all times lending a benevolent ear to their supplications,-defending them from their enemies, and all who may invade their rights. It is our wish, then, that you, my dear son, and others who may be our successors, should be anxious to retain in your mind these our exhortations and requests, along with the blessing of the Son of God, who taught sons to obey their parents, and declared of himself, that he came into the world, not to do his own will, but the will of his Father who is in heaven. In testimony, therefore, of the devotion with which we are animated towards the religious house so highly esteemed and sincerely beloved by us, we have addressed the present letter to these holy men, to be shewn hereafter to our successors. Given at Cardross, on the 11th of May, in the twenty-fourth year of our reign."

The next biographies are of Barbour, Wynton, and Fordun, the most ancient chroniclers of Scotland; the sketches of whom, and remarks upon their works, are highly interesting. In the life of Wynton we meet the following curious mention of the famous witches of Macbeth:

"In Wynton this whole scene is a dream. Three strange unearthy women, whom he knows to be conversant with futurity, visit his slumbers nightly, one of whom salutes him as Thayne of Crumbachty, or Cromarty, the other as Thayne of Moray, the third as King.

r as Thayne of Moray, the third as At night he thocht in hys dreaming, That syttand he wes beside the Kyng, At a sele in huntyng; swa In-til his leisch had greyhundis twa, He thocht, qubile he wes swa syttand, He saw three wemen by gangand, And tha wemen than thocht he Thre werd sisters mast lyk to be. The fyrst he hard say gangand by, Lo, yondyr the Thayne of Crwmbachty; The tothir woman sayd agane, Of Morave, yondyr I se the Thayne; The third than sayd, 'I se the Kyng.' All this he herd in hys dremyng.

All this is not only extremely natural and probable, but bears every mark of the truth.

Boece wrought this up into a real supernatural scene, and Shakespeare immortalised it. The annexed is also a striking notice, and relates to Wynton and Fordun:

"It is a singular fact, and gives a melancholy picture of the very slight circulation of literary works, although written by contemposuch an obedience to his precepts as may merit raries, and in the same country, that these two authors were mutually ignorant of each other's productions.

The life of James I., given in part, is worthy enclosing his park, and making additions to his his father's example, endeavours, with his whole of the rest of the volume. There seems to be an error in p. 193, where 4864 A.M. and 4864 B.c. are identified.

Altogether, this is one of the best of these publications.

The Destinies of Man. By Robert Millhouse. 12mo. pp. 88. London, 1832. Simpkin and

Or Robert Millhouse and his poetical works we have repeatedly spoken in the Literary Gazette; and it would be a very imperfect record of the literature and genius of the time, did it fail to notice the efforts of so remarkable an individual. It is very common to see the shafts of ridicule launched at the lowly aspirants who essay an entrance into the temple of fame; and to be at once a ploughboy, a servant, a me-chanic, or any humble rank in life, and a poet, is to provoke the satire of the thoughtless and unfeeling. We are far from wishing to encourage the "idle trade," where it would interfere with essential duties, or where it is prompted by conceit rather than by talent; but, on the other hand, we think it hard to merge in almost one-common censure the innocent and laudable productions of those whose lot happens to be cast among the poorer classes of the community. It is true their minds are not cultivated in the same school with the fortunate scholar; but Nature alone is a powerful teacher where she finds capacity and imagination; and, without instancing the mighty names she has enrolled among the highest in Time's immortal scroll, we may assert that the claims of genius are not limited by circumstance, nor confined to any particular sphere.

Robert Millhouse, our readers are aware, is a stocking-weaver at Nottingham, and has never enjoyed any advantages over the mass of the body to which he belongs. He must therefore have been imbued with much native energy, to have struggled into the note he has obtained; and he must have had a true sense of poetical leanty to have written such verse as has flowed from his pen. Nor has this spoilt him for his station in society; on the contrary, we are assured that his conduct has always been orderly and correct, so as to entitle him, as a man, to the respect of all who know him.

Amid cheerless and ill-paid labour, when we see such a person firmly adhering to right principles, and endeavouring to disseminate them, as in the poem before us, we, at least, feel a sensible pleasure in encouraging him, and we trust that public success will complete his re-Ward.

The Destinies of Man is composed in language which would reflect credit on the best education; and the thoughts are not unworthy of the subject. We do not mean to hold the poem up as wonderful, or not amenable to critical blame; but we are free to say, that it Possesses very considerable merit, and, especially when we look at the situation of the author, does deserve a very favourable reception. The following touch, early in the little volume, will illustrate our dicta:

Which throws its witchcraft o'er the minstrel's breast;
When young ambition, panting after fame,
Illumes the sweetest slumbers of our rest
With dreams of fairy-land—those visions blest—
Those meteors dipt in heaven—which lead the mind
Through realms by fancy's loveliest rainbows drest—
Then vanish into darkness—while the wind
Bears to the wretch forlorn the coldness of mankind.

Mind has its changes—yet there still remain Virue, the beam of truth, the patriot's flame, Tears due to misery, though they full in vain, And the calm throbbings for that best of fame, Which human apathy may never tame:—These are beyond the reach of man's control—These are beyond the reach of man's control—These find their meed above, from whence they came,

And are the pure oblations of the soul, Rising to Him, whose word sustains this wondrous whole!"

There is a very animated description of the deluge, from which we will copy a few stanzas, as farther specimens of the writer's powers.

At length, in terrors, came the doubtful morn!
Then, in its strength, the increaching flood began;
And the scaled dountains of the deeps were torn,
While, from the rending clouds the torrents ran:
Awe seized the boldest—for the homes of man,
Regal or mean, to rushing streams gave way; And on the uplands, in a narrower span,
Tribe following tribe, beneath the tempest's sway,
Join'd with the thunder's voice their wailing of dismay.

What congregated multitudes were there!what congregated multitudes were time:— Men of five centuries, still fierce in crime; Those giants of their race, unused to fear, With looks majestical, but not sublime: There matrons old, in nothing grave but time— And warriors, ardent in the bloom of years And virgin beauty, fading in its prime—
And youthful brides, sad, wasting in their tears—
And wild despair, and madness, scowling towards the

And there came on, in restless love of life, And there came on, in restless love of life,
Domestic flocks and herds, with hurrying pace,
And beasts of prey, not yet subdued from strife:—
The antelope, and roebuck of the chase,
Bounding to 'scape from death—and in that space
The reptiles crept along the slippery ground,
Or clung to man, with horrible embrace;
The vulture overhead, in wheeling round,
Scream'd, or, alighting fierce, his dying victim found! Not yet was Nature vanquish'd!-

A few terrific days and nights were past,
And the vast waters rose on every side;
And still the sheet-like rains were falling fast,
While from the mountains rush'd the eddying tide;
And yet they sought those mountains—far and wide
Death had reduced the multitude to few;
Famine had wrought his deeds, in sorm of pride,
And the devouring flood still onward drew;
While to the shelving rocks the trembling remnant fle

Then came the extreme of horrors! Hone in vain Then came the extreme of horrors! Hope in vain Look'd out, bewilder'd, o'er the vast prolound:
The famish'd mother, reckless of her pain,
Hung o'er her dying babes, and clasp'd them round;
The fainting father, stratch'd upon the ground,
Shared with the serpent and the wolf his bed;
There, tame with dread, the lion ceased to bound,
And, couchant, sought a pillow for his head,
And trembled with affright, and rested on the dead.

Still swell'd the mighty waters !- and they swept Still swell'd the mighty waters !—and they swept A portion of the lingering band away; Some towards the topmost mountain-summits crept, Where flocks of birds were screaming in dismay; Those summits mock'd their efforts, and they lay Where the forced torrent, foaming, sunk below;
The sun, through broken clouds, sent forth a ray,
Which led their sight to lengthening scenes of wee,
And tipt with light the waves, and mark'd their over-

Then o'er them closed the congregated seas, And the ark rode in safety on their breast."

An apostrophe to the Ocean follows, which we deem highly poetical.

"Thou boundary of empires! whose renown
Lives but in mockery of history's page—
Whose tyrant-kings went prowling up and down,
Till vanquish'd in the grasp of withering age;
Decay subdued their greatness, for the rage
Of conquering time has chased them from the earth;
Their arts and records are a theme to engage Long disquisitions, of but little worth,
While thou art reigning still, in thine unsocial mirth.

The young Sun woo'd thee with his dawning light, And the first moonbeams sported on thy breast, Ere maddening tempests roused thy giant might, Breaking, with desperate peals, thy dream of rest; And sometimes now thou slumberest, and art drest Gay as a bride, in robes that sunbeams weave; When crimson clouds adorn the glowing west, And thy scarce-rippling waves in beauty heave—All faithless when serene, and smiling to deceive."

The term "unsocial mirth" is enough to stamp a poetical mind. Nor are the subjoined lines less decisive of the same character, though in a poor Nottingham stocking-weaver.

The Sun emerges while frail mortals sleep;—
Spring will return, although we heed it not;—
The laughing Summer will come on, to steep
The flowers with dews, in many an unknown spot;—
The Autumn will go forth and bless the cot,
Where the poor peasant takes no note of time;
And snows, unwelcome, will descend to blot
The fairest landscapes,—and the storm sublime, Though man lift up his voice, will sweep the wintry clime.

Will the stars weep because our hearts are sad?— No sympathy have they with our dismay;— Nor will they brighter shine when we are glad:— At our command, will yonder comet stay, And gild no sky but ours?—alas! we lay Such schemes on earth, that even fools despise."

With this we shall conclude our extracts. The author (after the flood) glances over the ancient world, — Assyria, Egypt, Thebes, Greece, and Rome; and ends, having a dash at the Church of England, in the vein of liberalism,* with a paraphrastic laudamus in the style of the Psalmist.

In the way of criticism we shall not be particular. A severe judgment would have corrected many verbal weaknesses, and poor and even inapplicable epithets; but our readers can appreciate the whole by the extracts we have made. We need not, therefore, go at length into the most disagreeable part of our task: "fetters it with shade," page 8; "weeps" and "throbs through broken slumbers, like an o'er-wept child," p. 23, are merely proofs of inappositeness and inelegance, which occur too frequently. We have also to observe on the recurrence of common-place rhymes in almost every second page; but, again and again, we urge, that even in the most polished and accomplished writer these things would be only trivial defects; in Robert Millhouse, the weaver of Nottingham, they ought not to be noted; and our excuse for offending against our own rule, is that, if we did not specify the defects, we might be supposed to be the blind panegyrists of a petitioning bard. In other times, Millhouse would have needed no merciful consideration; he might well have stood upon his own character and performances: but in these days of superabundant mediocrity, it requires good fortune to be appreciated at aught like a real value.

Lectures on the Steam-Engine. By Dr. Lardner. New edition. 12mo. pp. 268. London, 1832. Taylor.

This new edition of a valuable work on an important mechanical (we might almost say superhuman) power, contains two additional lectures on subjects of popular interest, viz. a long one on the Liverpool and Manchester railway, and a very short notice on the employment of steam-carriages on public roads. In the former, Dr. Lardner gives great praise to Mr. Gurney for his efforts during ten years, and especially since 1825, in improving steamcarriages, so as to overcome all the obstacles presented to their travelling on the common public roads with passengers or goods. He asserts that such carriages would not injure

* "Oh! ye who are the shepherds of his fold,—
On whose example faith and works depend;
Your hands, like His, should grasp not after gold,—
He never sought reward from foe or friend!
Ye preach his Gospel! whose benignant end
Is peace, and charity to all mankind!
He kept no grinding factor, to contend
In sanctioned law-suits—looking mercy blind—
Like the base Gaul, whose sword the doubtful scale inclined.

chied.
And you, in clothing which I will not name;
Who prowl amongst His flock yourselves to keep;
Full oft, your actions bring his Word to shame
With scotling fools, and make Religion weep!
'Twas His, through all His pilgrimage, to steep
The bleeding heart, wherever it was found!
Your feet the boundaries of His fold o'erleap;
And, while the flock defenceless roam around, ossies the case were inflicting neares were Ye seize the easy prey, inflicting many a wound.

Was He ambitious of what men call great?
He served the board, and bathed His followers' feet;
He had no palace, graced in pompous state;
Nor sighed for greetings in the public street:
His prayers were brief in holiness! and meet
To reach the ear of Heaven's eternal King!
For they were sacred, humble, and discreet;—
He called no sect, or partisan, to bring sanction to His Word, by useless cavilling.

Ye rend His Church asunder !"

roads so much as those drawn by horses-as broader wheels can be used, and the weight of the apparatus and fuel, &c. has been much reduced. The doctor is also of opinion that the machine may be so constructed as to ascend the steepest hills on most of our roads; but at any rate that horses might be put to in aid of them at places where such pulls are to be overcome. Were machinery to supersede animal draught as it exists at present, it is calculated that sufficient food for the support of eight millions of added population could be raised! The volume then alludes to Mr. Hancock's steamcarriages, about to be established between Paddington and the Bank, and other environs of London: also to Mr. Ogle's carriage, now trying experiments in the country, but which Dr. Lardner had not seen, and was therefore unable to describe with accuracy; which we regret, as, from all we ourselves know, it is certainly one of the most ingenious and promising of these rival speculations. It farther appears, that Mr. Trevithick, the original inventor of the steam-carriage, has a new and improved specimen ready to start; and that Dr. Church, of Birmingham, has actually formed a company to employ steam-coaches, &c. between Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, and London. We shall see.

Of the second lecture we need say little, as it simply relates to Mr. Perkins's clever steamgun, paddle-wheels, and other curious and re-markable inventions, exhibited at the Adelaide Rooms, and which we have already described in the Literary Gazette.

Oral Traditions of the Cinque Ports and their Localities, compared with Antiquarian Re-searches, Natural Causes, and other Effects. By Captain K. B. Martin, of the General

Steam Navigation Company. 8vo. pp. 31.
London, 1832. Harding; Kidd; Gilbert.
An odd title-page, respecting "natural causes and other effects," opens to us a little sketch on an interesting topic, and which might be expanded into a very entertaining volume. The worthy captain treats us, however, with only a short trip, in which, shewing us the coast of the channel, he contends that it has been prodigiously changed by a great convulsion, and not by any gradual encroachment or recession of the sea. He also declares the Godwin Sands to have been in ancient times the real estate and bond fide domain of Earl Godwin; that ships now ride or sink where formerly men inhabited towns and walked in fields; and that, vice versá, men now inhabit towns and walk in fields where the waves of the ocean rolled. The speculation is amusing, and in many points very fairly sustained by data; though we must repel the argument (page 10) founded on the Roman naval vessel discovered nine or ten years ago in the bed of the river Rother, because that Roman ship was clearly proved to be an old Dutch fishing craft.

The Pilgrim of Erin, and other Poems. 12mo. pp. 120. London, 1832. Dalton. Our Pilgrim of Erin is warm; in his principal poem patriotically—in the "other," rather too much for publication, in the amative vein.

Quinti Horatii Flacci Opera; with Annotations in English, &c. &c. By the Rev. H. Pemble, B.A. 8vo. pp. 577. London, 1832. Longman and Co.; Cadell; Baldwin; Whittaker; and many other booksellers.

This is the first Delphin edition of a classic we remember to have seen done with English notes: altogether, we like it much. It is certainly true that it is rational to explain an unknown by a known language; and the editor has been much indebted to Doering for the matter he has thus given us. We have discovered some imperfections in the index; but still we do not think, were we buying a Horace, that we should prefer any copy to this, so ably edited by Mr. Pemble.

Pinnock's Goldsmith's England. Pp. 508. 23d edition, revised by W. C. Taylor, M.A. London, 1832. Whittaker.

MR. W. C. TAYLOR had little to do in revising this excellent abridgment of history; and what he has added is not so well done as the original portion. The portrait of William IV. is more like Mr. Wrench in a stage disguise.

Pinnock's Catechisms: Hebrew Grammar. Third edition. 18mo. pp. 84. London, 1832. Whittaker and Co.

As far as it goes, a useful, and, generally speak-ing, accurate compend of Hebrew grammar, though containing some rather important errors for which the compiler must be held responsible (ex. gr. pp. 5, 10, 14, 17, 43, 82, &c.), and others (pp. 6, 38, 55, 58, &c.) probably to be laid to the charge of the printer: so that the scrupulous accuracy we have often insisted on as so essential in all elementary works, cannot be claimed by this publication. It, however, performs creditably all that may be expected from such a précis.

NEW ANALYSIS OF SOLAR LIGHT.

Dr. BREWSTER, to whom the science of optics has been so much indebted, lately published further experiments to prove the inability of the prism to analyse light, and the division of the petrum into three spectra of different colours, si, yellow, and blue. The results of this insignation are stated in the following proposi-

1. White light consists of three simple colours, red, yellow, and blue, by the mixture of which all other colours are formed.

2. The solar spectrum, whether formed by prisms of transparent bodies, or by grooves in metallic and transparent surfaces, consists of three spectra of equal length, beginning and terminating at the same points, viz. a red spec-trum, a yellow spectrum, and a blue spectrum.

3. All the colours in the solar spectrum are compound colours, each of them consisting of red, yellow, and blue light, in different proportions.

4. A certain quantity of white light, incapable of being decomposed by the prism, in consequence of all its component rays having the same refrangibility, exists at every point of the spectrum, and may at some points be exhibited in an insulated state.

Phrenologists had accounted for the insensibility of certain eyes to particular colours, by a supposed want of, or disease in, the organ of colour; but Dr. B. says, that in the case of eyes blind to red light, blue and yellow are the only colours recognised, and they are, abstracting the red, the two remaining colours of the spectrum. To such eyes light is always seen in the red space; but this arises from the eye being sensible to the yellow and blue rays which are mixed with the red light. Hence blue light will be seen in the place of the violet, and a greenish yellow will appear in the orange and red spaces; or, which is the same thing, the spectrum will consist only of the yellow and blue spectra.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Portraits of the principal Female Characters in the Waverley Novels. Part I. With illustrative Letter-press. London, 1832. Chapman and Hill; Moon, Boys, and Graves; Fraser.

In our No. 813, we noticed two of the portraits which, together with two others, Flora Mac Ivor, by A. Chalon, and Rose Bradwardine, by C. R. Leslie, form this number. Both the novelties are beautiful specimens of the chalk style of engraving, and do much credit to Mr. H. Robinson and Mr. Mote, with whose productions we hope to become better acquainted than we are at present. In Flora, Mr. Chalon has shewn a fine sense of the exalted female character; and Leslie's Rose, with some quaintness, is as lovely a flower as artist could imagine.

Engravings from the Works of the late Henry Liversege. By S. Cousins, J. Bromley, W. Giller, J. P. Quilley, W. Ward, &c. Part I. London, 1832, Moon, Boys, and Graves; Manchester, Grundy.

This most promising artist was cut off in the blossoming of his fame, leaving behind him but few memorials of his great talent. But these, we rejoice to see, are in the course of being preserved, and made generally known, by means of engravings worthy of the ability and skill displayed in the originals. This first fasciculus contains the Weekly Register, by W. Giller,a cobbler reading the paper; Capt. Macheath, by W. Ward; and the Inquiry,—a boy asking at a door where he is to leave some game, by J. P. Quilley. Mezzotinto could not go farther in giving the full force and character of these very clever pieces, than which nothing in familiar life can be more true to nature. believe the whole number of pictures will not amount to thirty; and if executed with equal is not the tempest, the quicksand, the les-care and spirit, the volume will be a perfect treat to the collector, and better than a marble tomb to poor Liversege, who died at the early age of about twenty-six years.

Scrope and Sketches. By George Cruikshank.
Part IV. Robins and Co.

THE pencil of G. Cruikshank always affords us as much to point a moral as to raise a laugh. The Lively Pleasure-boat, with its very sick party - the Cigar - divan, with its apes of dandies the Devil's Frying-pan of annual Amusements—and a whole series of Tails, are as instructive, from their satire upon folly and vice, as they are amusing from their eccentricity and talent. The fancy of the artist seems to be inexhaustible; he is the Hogarth of his class, if indeed he be not sui generis, and a class by himself. Any person might wait an hour for dinner, in perfect good temper, with this one Part in the drawing-room.

Major's Cabinet Gallery of Pictures, selected from the splendid Collections of Art, public and private, which adorn Great Britain; with historical and critical Descriptions and Dissertations. By Allan Cunningham. No. I. London, J. Major.

ENGRAVINGS from Titian, Guercino, and Gainsborough, are the subjects of this No. I. of a new, and, if executed in a superior style, excellent design; but as we have not derived the satisfaction, either from the artists or from the literary matter, which we had a right to expect, we shall for the present abstain from criticism: and bid all concerned improve upon their beginning, if they look for that success which such an undertaking needs to support it, either in cash or character.

Finden's Landscape Illustrations to Murray's

Edition of the Life and Works of Lord Byron.

Part VI. London, 1832. Murray; Tilt. WE always come to this work with a full assurance of the excellence we shall find in its subjects, and we have little more to do than to name them as a bill of fare, that our readers may be aware of the treat that awaits them. And first we have the portrait of the Right Hon. Anne Isabella Lady Noel Byron, which in its character has much of Il Penserosa: it is beautifully engraved, after Newton, by W. H. Mote. This is finely contrasted by "the Maid of Saragoza," engraved by W. Finden, from a drawing by F. Stone: all here is ardour and animation, and speaks some desperate resolve. The vignettes give us Newstead Abbey, the Fountain at Newstead, and Hucknall church, Nottinghamshire. These are after drawings by W. Westall, A.R.A.; followed by Malta, after J. M. W. Turner, R.A.; Lachin-y-gair, after engraver and painter. Perhaps we should say that this fasciculus possesses a peculiar attraction, in offering as the portrait of Lady Byron, as a part connected with "the (quære Landscape?) Illustrations" of her noble husband. It is a very intellectual head, and a countenance which one cannot look upon without wishing that its destiny had been happier. The Maid of Saragoza had the ruin of country, and of every thing dear to human nature, to be consonant with her sacrifice: Lady Byron enjoyed every ingredient which might fill the cup of felicity, wealth, rank, intelligence. Do we not, one and all of us, founder our own ventures on the sea of life? It

Waiting for Death; an unfinished Engraving on wood by the late T. Bewick: being his But from that night my mother pined, and last work. London, Longman and Co.

Was there ever such a title?-why, it beats I toil for food from morn to eve, and soothe her Death's Doings out of the field; and at last we can only say, that, for a curiosity, "it is a sorry sight." As a memento of that celebrated artist's works, whose latest effort it is, it should find a place in the folio of the collector. Something allied to the High-mettled Racer, the subject is represented of a worn-out horse, in all its misery of skin and bone, exposed to the pitiless pelting of a snow-storm. The print is accompanied by some letter-press advocating the cause of humanity towards animals, better intended than expressed.

Scenes in Pompeii, viz. the Tragic Theatre, the Basilica, the Amphitheatre, the Forum and Temple of Jupiter, the Forum with Vesuvius, the Temple of Isis, the Street of Tombs from the Inn, the Street of Tombs from the Tomb of Diomedes. This Number places before our view these most interesting and celebrated ruins, where the vast and the magnificent of past ages fill the mind with wonder and admiration at the measure and extent of such mighty plans. Nor do we think that any elaborate details would give a more complete idea of their magnitude and character than these efficient sketches of the artist.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE COVENANTER'S SON.

Young Allan of the Hielands, my brother dear, is gone,

And dreary through the long, long nights I sit and weep alone;

My fancy hears his spirit voice within the twilight dim, And sleep brings but an aching dream of days gone by, and him! Of him, and of that fearful hour when from our own fire-side-

And from the Bible, where he knelt to seek his soul's true guide-

They dragg'd my brother forth to death-to death; as 'twere a crime

To worship as our fathers in the Covenanters' time!

My mother shriek'd-her wo was wild-she clasped their cruel knees;

But tears, nor yet her sad gray hairs, might plead with men like these:

They dragg'd him to the lonely moor, that dark and dreadful night, prayers, before our sight! I saw him kneel in manly bloom their deadly guns before-

I clasped him in my arms a corpse, all cold and red with gore :

They left me to my misery-like slaves of guilt they fled,

With the curse of Heaven and the brand of Cain upon their head.

My mother, like one half-deranged, lay moaning wild and deep,

And gazing on the corpse -that gaze had made a fiend to weep !

guish chok'd my breath;

I would have pray'd, but all my words burst forth in shrieks of death.

We buried him in secret, and in secret wept him dead;

as I may;

But what can heal the broken heart, recall the mind's lost ray?

And he, the truest, best of friends, young Bruce of Ronadell,

Hath sued me to become his bride-and, oh! I love him well:

But never will I quit thy side-no, no! my mother dear

Though he should choose some lovelier bride, and leave me, leave me here!

Some happier one who loves him more—but that could never be:

Oh, if-if I should lose my love, my mother dear, for thee-

If coldly he should turn away, and other maiden wed-Then, mother, let me die with thee_thy grave my bridal bed!

SKETCHES OF SCCIETY.

NOCTES WESTMONASTERIENSES .-- NO. II. " Come like shadows, so depart."

LET my reader, if he can, imagine the feelings which crowded themselves upon my mind. Time seemed to be annihilated, and ages and centuries contracted to a span. The vastness of the abbey was illuminated by a clear silvery and supernatural light, that seemed not to proceed from any determinate luminary, but was generally diffused throughout, penetrating into every niche and crevice, and displaying every form in bold and strong relief. My eyes wandered from one shape to another, as they glided past me with all the lineaments and energetic action of life, cach one habited in the costume of the period in which he lived. It seemed an unearthly masquerade, and struck me with unspeakable awe. The Catholic abbot of the twelfth century and the Protestant dean of the nineteenth might be seen in amicable converse; and the mailed knight of Edward the Third discussing some point of military tactics with the general of George the Fourth. For several minutes I was struck dumb with amazement. Was I dreaming? Was I entranced? No. What could it be? I seemed encompassed by some mighty spell. Garrick waited till I had in some degree recovered from my astonishment, then, turning towards me, said, "I see, sir, you appear somewhat surprised at beholding so numerous and so strange an assemblage here to-night; but, as I said before, I will initiate you into our mysteries, and will likewise introduce you to a And slew him there, amidst our cries and few friends; so come, and while we are making our way out of the chancel, I will explain every thing; and I think I can promise you some amusement, as well as instruction, in the conversation of men with whose deeds and fame you are perhaps well acquainted, though not with themselves."

I stammered forth my thanks, and followed my kind conductor into the nave of the cathedral. As we proceeded, I ventured to ask him how it was that he and so many of the illustrious dead were still wandering on earth, and whether they were doing penance? " I do not know," he replied, " whether I may be permitted to reveal all the secrets of our exist. self and another are the only mortals who ha ence after we have passed the inevitable go: but I may satisfy you in this point, that a whom you see here assembled worshipping c Creator in a terrestrial temple, are neither e cluded from the mansions of the blest, nor as

Doon'd for a certain term to walk the night, And for the day confined to fast in fires, Till the foul crimes done in our days of nature Are burnt and purged away.'

Besides, you are not to consider that we a prisoners in Paradise. The whole universe our heaven, or, to invert the words of Milton Satan.

' Which way we fly is heaven, ourselves are heaven.' We can, at a thought, transport ourselves any point of the creation to which our wish may direct us; and very often do we visit tho scenes which our past recollections have e deared to us. We are seldom absent from the sides of our living friends. I have been man times near you when you would least has suspected it." "Indeed!" I exclaimed in the utmost astonishment; "when and where? as why could I not see you then as now?" my good friend," said Garrick; " one questic at a time, if you please; for, privileged as v immortals are, we are not able to answer dozen queries at once." "I beg pardon; I". "No apologies, Mr. —... Come, take my ar and—" This mentioning my name, and mor over inviting me to take his arm, complete overset my already bewildered senses. sure I could in some degree account for h knowledge of my name, from his having sa that he had often been with me; but to ask n to take his arm-the arm of a ghost-of an un substantial shadow-this was really too muc I began to think that my good friend, M Garrick, was drawing too largely on my credi lity, and with difficulty suppressing a smile, contrived to stammer forth, "Your arm, sir take your arm?" "Yes, sir! take my arm! replied he seriously, and apparently wondering at my hesitation. "What! the arm of ghost?" "Oh! ay, I forgot,-I should hav told you before. I, however, beg now to infor you, that, at this present moment at least, I a no more a ghost than yourself. And to prothat, look at my shadow on the pavement; am much mistaken if you do not find it strongly defined as your own." I looked, ar it was as he said! "And," continued he, " you can overcome your reluctance to take tl arm of a ghost, as you are pleased to think m you will have still farther evidence of my su stantiality. Come, come now, take it, while proceed to initiate you.' I obeyed him in silent amazement, which was by no means lessened at finding that his lin was quite as solid as my own; nay, farthe I could feel the texture of the cloth of whi his dress was composed: and, moreover, as no proof was to be wanting to dispel any litt lingering cloud of scepticism in my mind, at sudden turn that he made, his sword (which ! wore in accordance with the fashion of his da got between my legs, and nearly threw us bo down. On our recovering our perpendicularit "There now," said he, laughing, "I ho that is enough to convince you." "Indeed is," I said; " but pray explain to me this cros of wonders which rush upon me, the one tree ing on the heels of the other." "I was also to explain," answered he, " when your hesit tion interrupted me. But to proceed .- Y must know then, in the first place, that we'd assume a material body at pleasure, which however, is always invisible to every one w has not undergone a certain probation. You lecome so qualified. That other one was An-poil Verri, who became acquainted with all But see, here he comes, in earnest conversa-, zonio Verri, who became acquainted with all the ancient Romans at the tomb of the Scipios, but who has, in his book, so libelled some of them, and the celebrated Lucretia in particular, that, as a friend, I would advise him to keep out of the way of Collatinus. I hope you, Mr. will take warning." "I hope, Mr. Garrick, that you can rely upon my honour? But tell me what is the nature of this probation?" "Nav, excuse me there. Were I to tell you, and you were to divulge it, the whole world would flock hither, and our old abbey would become by far the most popular place of resort in London. Why, we should be obliged to restrict ourselves to the precincts of Paradise, in order to avoid the pestering of your fellowmortals. This, therefore, I shall not tell you, and you must be content to remain in the cark. You should be satisfied with possessing one of the highest privileges that can be conferred on a living mortal. You will become acquainted with the great and good of every past age and of every country."

"What!" said I, "shall I see Homer and"—
"Yes," said Garrick, "and, by the way, ronder he is, in conversation with Milton and Dante." "Do you all then regularly assemble here?" "That rests entirely with curselves. We all have our favourite haunts, but we generally congregate in some Christian cathedral, particularly on festivals such as the present, when we employ ourselves in acts of adoration, and afterwards spend our me at my monument, and also thy love for the lation of the Meng Tsu, has been elected the time in agreeable intercourse and conver-sation." "What!" I asked, "do Catholies, Protestants, and Heathens, all worship tell thee else I shall be wroth, which I would two late productions for the press by Sir Walter here together?" "Sir," said Garrick sternly, not desire to be. See, here come our friends Scott; one called the Siege of Malta, the other here together?" "Sir," said Garrick sternly, not desire to be. See, here come our friends there are no sects in heaven: death opens Calderon and Schiller." These two great poets here together ?" all our eyes, and we are but of one faith; had now approached, I was immediately presented trust they will never, if recently written, see you come into the chancel sooner, you would to them by my kind friend Garrick, who ap the light. "I have one question more for my next paper. to put to you, Mr. Garrick; I trust you will not be annoyed with my curiosity, as you must be aware of the novelty of my situation, and the strangeness of all that you have just related to me. What I wish to know is this, you said you have often been near me-when? and where?" "Why, let me see, the last time was in Covent Garden Theatre, when you went to see the Hunchback. Shakespeare and myself had, after considerable waste of eloquence, succeeded in persuading Euripides and his worshipper Racine to enter a barbarous theatre, as they uncivilly term it. We sat in the next box to you." "In the next box! and Euripides and Shakespeare, how I wish I could have seen you! But how could Euripides understand English?" "Oh, my dear ir, we understand every language in Para-dise." "And how did they like Mr. Knowles" play?" "Why at first they were much annoved at what they called the criminal violation of the unities of time and place; but, however, the splendid acting of Miss Kemble soon overthrew all their objections. You will see them presently, as we had appointed to meet here to-night. Shakespeare has been present at the performance of the Hunchback on several occasions. He is a very great admirer of Sheridan Knowles; and, to confess the truth, so am I Our great bard is highly indignant myself. at the slight degree of encouragement which the drama meets with in the present age, and more especially with the apparent want of original genius. He vehemently denounces Shakespeare—" Well, David, so you have got our friend, Master—— with you; I am right glad to see him. I bid you welcome, sir," he Comet.—Professor Harding, of Götting continued, turning towards me, and extending his right hand in the most amicable manner. As may be supposed, I pounced on it as an the Serpent. It has no train, and the light is eagle on his prey. To clasp in my hand that feeble. DRAMA.

STRAND THEATRE.

A MOST ludicrous and laughable little piece has been produced here, called Cork Legs; and such legs they are as are sure of a run beyond not wonder if they heat Mynheer Von Woodenblock, the famous Dutch merchant, whose artificial pin ran away with him over the whole world, and is still, we believe, pegging on with his skeleton in a perpetual motion. As a composition, there is certainly nothing in this farcical affair upon which we can compliment the author; but we may say he has displayed, throughout, a very good understanding. This little theatre has been threatened with prosecution, for swindling the regular or leg-itimate drama; and now it has, we fear, given more ground than ever for conviction. That the principal performers are all Legs, can be proven against them; and therefore it is most likely that they will be taught to know what limbo is. In the meantime, they are funny fellows, men and women of them; their corks are sure to draw; and we could say no more in praise of the legs if we wore our pen to a stump.

The Scottish Thistle. - This ancient emblem of Scots pugnacity, with its motto, Nemo me impune lacessit, is represented of various species in royal bearings, coins, and coats of armour; so that there is some difficulty in saying which is the genuine original thistle. The origin of what any cork legs ever had before. We should the national badge itself is thus handed down by tradition :- When the Danes invaded Scotland, it was deemed unwarlike to attack an enemy in the pitch darkness of night, instead of a pitched battle by day; but on one occasion the invaders resolved to avail themselves of this stratagem; and in order to prevent their tramp from being heard, they marched barefooted. They had thus neared the Scottish force unobserved, when a Dane unluckily stepped with his naked foot upon a superbly prickly thistle, and instinctively uttered a cry of pain, which discovered the assault to the Scots, who ran to their arms, and defeated the foe with a terrible slaughter. The thistle was immediately adopted as the insignia of Scotland.

Zohrab, the Hostage. By the Author of "Hajji Baba." 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. R. Bentlev.

MR. MORIER'S fame is too well established to require any eulogy from us, when we direct the public attention to a new work from his admired pen. We need only notice, that in the choice of his subject the delightful author of Hajji Baba is again at home; for though the scene is laid in Persia, his opportunities of studying the manners and feelings of that country have been so abundant, that even the mysteries which belong to its policy, its female seclusion, and its character in every respect, have been ably penetrated, and are here developed in a most spirited and entertaining narrative.

Combining a few historical facts with fiction for this purpose, Mr. Morier has placed his imagined hero and heroine under the dominion of the actual and famous Aga Mohamed Shah, so famous for his wars, his wisdom, and his cruelty, as may be seen by reference to Sir John Malcolm's history of Persia; and he

"The Prince Fatteh Ali, who is supposed to be the present king of Persia, the Vizir Hajji Ibrahim, the slave Sadek, belong to history; but the hump-backed barber, the ardent Zulma, the officious Shir Khan, Zaul Khan, and the Asterabadis and Turcomans, and others, have been created to serve the purposes of my tale. The anecdote of the Shah and the bloody handkerchief in the second volume, and that of counting the eyes with the handle of his whip in the third, among others, were related to me by creditable witnesses. The mode of the Shah's death is historical—the details fiction. It would be tedious and indeed unnecessary to define where history ends and fiction begins in the different turns and windings which the thread of my narrative takes; and perhaps it will be sufficient to say, that my object has been to place before the reader a succession of personages, whose manner of speech, whose thoughts and actions, and general deportment, are illustrative of Persia and the East.

And we could no where find a production in which a similar design has been executed in a more agreeable and interesting manner: while perusing the volumes we have been living in Persia, and partaking in all the vicissitudes so well conceived and so admirably related to exhibit the condition of its despotic government and curious people, who have been called the Frenchmen of the East. Our first extract shall be a whole-length portrait of the tyrant who figures largely in the story.

figures largely in the story.

"Nature, in forming Aga Mohamed Shah, intended to have installed a mind of uncommon vigour into a body capable of seconding its energies, by making it full of activity and strength; but the whole scheme was frustrated by the cruelty of man. Whilst the sharpness of intellect was preserved, it became diseased with ill humour and moroseness; for every time that his body became an object of contemplation, he entertained such disgust towards himself, that the feeling finished by placing him at enmity with all mankind. What would otherwise have been tall and erect, was now bent with the curve of apparent age :- what would have been strength of muscle and breadth of shoulder, seemed blighted and shrivelled. His face, particularly in a country where beards are universally worn, appeared like a blotch of leprosy-for it was almost totally hairless; it could only boast of a few straggling bristles, which here and there sprouted at irregular distances, like stunted trees upon a poor soil. The skin which covered it resembled wetted parchment, hanging in baggy furrows down the cheeks, under the chin, and about the neck. This spectral countenance—for so it might be called-was, however, lighted up by a pair of small gray eyes of more than human lustre, which, from under two ragged curtains of eyelids, flashed all their intelligence abroad; and, as they expressed rage, jealousy, or cruelty, made those who were exposed to their fire feel as if they were under the fascination of some blood-seeking monster. But with all this, there were moments when this face would smile, and would even relax into looks of pity and benevolence; but so treacherous were these symptoms esteemed, that at length they were only looked upon as signals of some extraordinary disaster, or as beacons to warn those in danger to be upon their guard."

His lovely niece and a hump-backed barber are the only beings on earth for whom this fearful personage entertains a dangerous liking; the former is the heroine, and the latter the origin of much of the mischief and fatality, which, like kind Reviewers, we do not unfold to our readers, lest we should deprive them of some of the pleasure they will derive from the work itself. At the outset the Shah goes for a week's hunting; and after he is shaven, before dawn, we have the following description:—

"To the Khajeh Bashi he said, as with trepidation that officer made the lowest inclination of the lody, 'Let the Banou (for so he called his niece) depart immediately; she may either go on horseback or in takhteravan;—but, mark you, it is upon your head that the corook* be of the strictest, from here onwards towards Firouzabad, and to twenty parasangs round that place, death, instant death, will be the reward of the wretch who cosses the path of my house.—Go.' Of the chief astrologer he inquired—'Have you a fortunate hour on your astrolobe? Have we permission to leave our capital to-day?' 'May I be your sacrifice!' said the star-gazer; 'the fortune of our king, upon whom be blessings and peace, is always on the rise. At one hour, less five minutes, after the morning prayer, the foot of activity must be placed in the stirrup of accomplishment; and just at the full hour, the hoofs of the royal steed must strike on the threshold of the Imperial Gate.' 'Well, well!' said the shah, 'you have used your science to good purpose. Go—you have whitened your face this morning!' To the master of the horse he said — 'What horse do we ride to-day?' 'Your slave,' said the khan, 'has prepared for the blessed person of the king of kings the ambling Murwari, or pearl, with the torquoise furniture, for the beginning of the journey, and then Ser mest, or drunkard, when your majesty comes to the hunting ground.'

'There is no harm in that,' said the king; be it so; -you are a good servant! Collect the gholams, and let the whole equipage be at the gate.' Where does the shah hunt to-day?' said the king to the chief huntsman, who was a stout rough man, weather-heaten withal, with a fine bold countenance. 'Where shall we break cover?' 'I have to represent,' said the old sportsman, 'if the king orders the greyhounds to be taken into the plain after we have passed the Teng, or narrow pass, among the low bushes we shall find abundance of hares. Beyond that, striking into the mountains on the left, there are rumours of some two or three gour khur (wild asses) having been seen; and if the shah sees no impediment, your slave will place relays of dogs at the proper stations, and thus we may bring one down; for, may their homes be ruined! they are the wariest of all beasts, and as for their speed, we must trust in God and our horses if we hope to overtake them. What else shall I venture to say? Praise be to God! a marksman, with a single ball from off his horse, like unto our shah, man never has seen; and with the blessings of the prophet, we may by luck get one of the unsainted beasts.' 'And make a good kabob, of him, eh?' said the shah, smiling. food kaboo, or him, enr said the shan, sminng.

'Inshallah! Inshallah!' exclaimed all the attendants. 'Go, go,' said his majesty; 'you are a man of wisdom; so be it! But mark; see that my Georgian gun be in order. After all, the true Lesgui gun is the best. As for your European guns, they are worse than nothing; they have no weight; they are made for children, not men.' Upon my eyes be it!' said the chief huntsman, and took his leave. To the tent-pitcher the Shah then addressed himself: 'The Shah sleeps at Bagh Shah to-night; at Firouzabad the next. Let the tents of the harem be pitched immediately in the enclosed valley of Savachi; let the running stream flow through the pavilion of the lady Banou; let a garden be made; let fountains play; and let the reservoir be decorated with fruits and flowers. But, as you regard your head, let none but the chosen servants of the Khelwet or secret apartments be near at hand, and let the guards be placed at the avenues of the rocky passages. Let all be in readiness. Go! the shah never speaks twice.' Having dismissed his officers, the king arose to prepare for his morning devotions, of the whole of which he was ever a scrupulous observer; although it was observed of him, that his greatest acts of cruelty generally succeeded their performance. He first washed his feet, hands, and arms, and crown of his head; then repaired to the praying carpet, which, together with the bit of sacred clay, his Koran, and his comb, were spread for him in the corner of the room, in the direction of Mecca. Here, with an audible voice, his hands uplifted behind his ears, this dreaded despot began the celebrated Fatteh, which all Mussulmans look upon as the most perfect form of prayer, and in the repetition of which they daily announce and re-establish their faith in their prophet. He then went through every genuflection, every inclination, and every salutation of the sacred clay of Mecca, with the most scrupulous precision, whilst Sadek and Hashim remained in attendance on the outside of the apartment in breathless suspense. As soon as the prayer was over, and having gone through the ceremony (for it could be nothing else) of combing the two or three straggling hairs that grew on his upper lip, or wandered about in solitude on the surface of his bony chin, he called aloud to his servants that his breakfast might be served. This was done in a simple, unostentations, though costly manner, the dishes, trays, and covers, being of massive gold, whilst the smaller cups were of the finest china. Sadek on one knee placed the khonchehs before his royal master, the whole having been previously uncovered by breaking the seal of the chief cook, who had tasted the whole, and pronounced it fit for the royal palate; in other words, that it contained no poison."

Zohrab, the hero, an independent Mazan. derini chief, has greatly incensed the Shah, but is spared for political reasons, when the following scene takes place. The chief huntsman was "a heavy-headed man, with a copious ap-pendage of black beard and mustachoes, large eyes, and shaggy brows, mounted upon herculean shoulders: coarse and rough in manner, he little knew the forms of a court, and al though the king in the field allowed much latitude in the quantum of homage which was due to him, yet in general he was very punctilious when seated on his musnud, being aware that half the terror attached to his high situation, among a people greatly alive to outward shew. would vanish were he ever to allow of one step which had the appearance of intimacy. In order to comprehend the nature of the chief huntsman's present intrusion at court, the reader must be informed that it was frequently the custom among the kings of Persia, after a great and successful hunting-party, in which game of all descriptions, such as antelopes, deer, wild goats, boars, and wild asses, were alain, to erect a pillar, upon which the heads of such animals were fixed, either in niches, or on exterior hooks. There is a specimen of one such pillar now to be seen at Guladûn near Ispahan, the record of a hunt of the famous Shah Ismael, which, notwithstanding the lapse of centuries, still exhibits numerous skulls and horns of wild animals. Agah Mohamed Shah on this occasion had determined to leave a similar record. His hunting excursion, to the moment of Zohrab's seizure, had been extraordinarily successful; and when this unlooked-for piece of good fortune had befallen him, on the impulse of the moment, he determined to erect a pillar of skulls, a kelleh minar, as it is called, in order that he might place the head of his prisoner, or, as one of his courtiers had called it, of his finest head of game, on the summit, thus to commemorate the great success of this eventful day. The order was given the Shikar Bashi on the field; and not having been coun-made an awkward prostration of the body, and, without taking off his boots, which in fact is etiquette for men of his profession, began his gry epithets, which burst forth in the following manner: 'Who art thou, dog? whose cur art thou? why dost thou stand before me with that head of thine, which ought long ago to have been food for a bomb? Must the Shah continue to partake of disrespect, as if he were a Jew or a Frank? Am I no one in my own dominions? bearded by a Mazanderani wherefore standest thou there?' The rough forester, little expecting such a reception, stood like one impaled, with his tongue cleaving to the roof of his mouth, and at first could scarcely utter beyond his 'arxi mi kunum,' until after various attempts, fear having almost paralysed his senses, he exclaimed, 'The pillar is ready to kiss your feet; it is ready; the skulls have all been placed; there is only one skull wanting at the top-only one skull, by the head of the king! only one skull.' Whether acting under the influence of an eunuch's waywardness, or whether the king was struck by the coincidence of the chief huntsman's exposition, 'one skull, by the head of the king,' is not to be explained; but certain it is that he yielded at once to the temptation of spilling blood, which was circulating in the fullest vigour throughout his frame, and exclaimed, 'One head thou wantest?' 'Yes,' said the huutsman, 'yes, one head; may it so please your majesty.' 'What head can be better than thine?' roared the tyrant, in savage merriment. 'Here, off with his head. Ay, Nasakchi, executioner,' he exclaimed to a man of bloody deeds, who was always in attendance, here, go, complete the minar.' There was a hesitation amongst the attending officers in the execution of this atrocious deed. The man called upon to act went doggedly to work; and innocence spoke so powerfully in favour of the poor wretch, that every one present seemed to expect that so barbarous an order would be countermanded; but, no! the animal was rife for blood, and blood it was determined to have. His horrid face broke into a demoniacal expression of fury when he saw that there was hesitation in obeying his commands. The ragged skin, which fell in furrows down his cheeks, began to bloat; the eyes seemed to roll in blood; and the whole frame, from which in general all circulation seemed to fly, wore a purple hue; he would have darted from off his seat, and not only have executed the fatal sentence upon his victim himself, but would have extended his revengeful fury to those who had refused to be the ministers of it, had not the Nasakchi Bashi in person (worthy servant of such a master), who had just reached the scene of action, with a light and cunning step, crept behind the victim, and with one blow of his deadly black Khorassan blade, severed the unfortunate man's head from his body. The heavy corpse fell with a crash on one side, whilst the head bounded towards the despot, the eyes talk of the Franks, their discipline, and their glaring horribly, the tongue protruded to a artillery: we spit upon their fathers' graves.

termanded, was so quickly executed, that the frightful length, and streams of gore flowing monument had been erected, and all its niches and spouting in all directions. The vizar, who duly filled with the heads, before any fresh or- was upon the point of again endeavouring to der on the subject could be given. An iron allay the passions of his dangerous master, had spike was seen to issue from the summit, as if been too late to stop the executioner's hand; been too late to stop the executioner's hand; waiting for its last victim. As soon as the but well was it for him that he did delay, for chief huntsman appeared before the Shah, he nothing but the appalling scene that now presented itself could have counteracted the violence of the king. The moment he saw blood, he seemed at once to be soothed into quiet. speech before the king had even deigned to the most wicked of our natures there must be look upon him. This want of respect put the a revulsion from evil to good. Conscience will match as it were to the still active combustion raise her voice, although she may at first be of the king's mind, and set fire to a train of an-gry epithets, which burst forth in the following spoil, at once is tamed. This was the case with the Shah. He contemplated his work with a thoughtful look, his features resumed their wonted dull and leaden expression; and then, as if his wayward nature was not satisfied with tormenting him, he turned with asperity to the Nasakchi Bashi, and accused him in no measured terms with having officiousboy—now butted at by a cow who would ly interposed in what was no business of his. call itself a man! Speak, Merdiki, speak! 'Dog and villain,' he exclaimed, 'why did you Dog and villain, he exclaimed, why did you slay my chief huntsman? What demon impelled your officious hand in this deed? is it for you that there is such a feeling as compassion, and that the Shah can spare as well as he can spill! Go, go! clear up your work, and finish it by wiping your own self from our presence.' Although similar scenes, equally characteristic of the cruelty and caprice of its instigator, were not uncommon, still, to the horror of this scene succeeded a dread and appalling silence throughout the camp."
We copy another: when this monster's suspicions were excited as to his niece's love for Zohrab.

"At length rousing himself from his apparent stupor, like the deadly boa rising from torpor and preparing for a fresh victim, he wreaked the first effects of his rage upon the poor keshekchi. 'Strike his neck,' he roared out to the full extent of his terrible voice, as he looked upon the offender. 'Go, and let others know what it is to be negligent of the Shah's affairs.' Upon this a ferash gazeb, a most ferocious monster, stepped up, and with one blow of his sword severed the wretched man's head from his body. We will spare our readers the horrid acts of cruelty which succeeded this iniquitous execution. After he had begun the exercise of his power in his inner spartments, the tyrant transferred himself to the great Dewan Khaneh, at his usual mid-day hour of giving audience, called the Selam i Aum, and there, clothed in his blood-coloured cloak, he gave full scope to the sanguinary dictates of his nature. It would be shocking to the feelings of those who only hear of executions, after long and tedious investigations, and in solitary and marked instances, to be told the numbers of innocent as well as guilty persons who, almost without a reason, and all without a hearing, fell under the suspicions and the consequent death-stroke of this odious king. But let it not be thought that his subjects thought the worse of him for thus using his power. Instead of exciting feelings of opposition to his rule, he only the better secured his authority. 'Tis true they would call him a shailan, a devil, a blood-drinker, a despot; but then at the same time they would add the epithet ajaib, wonderful, which in most of their minds would also imply 'admirable.' 'Ajaib Shahi, wonderful king!' would they say of him. 'If you want a lord of the sword, look to him—our king is indeed a king. Whose beir sanguinary king; and in this instance hose who did not come under his displeasure vere all in his favour, inasmuch as they felt that he had in fact cause for the exercise of his displeasure. Among others, our garrulous friend, the boasting mehmander, had hitherto escaped observation; and standing in the midst of his companions, having thrown his cap more than was usual upon the side of his head, and thrust his shawl well over his hips, said,—'This is what I call in truth being a king. Were I a king I also would look upon men's heads as dirt; bah! bah! bah!' said he, waving his hand horizontally, ' how I would cut them off! I have a way of my own for cutting off heads. of what use are guards if they do not keep watch? And that buffalo their chief, too, who pretended to teach me my duty; well did he eat the stick this morning! Well done king, baricallah! We Persians are demons without the stick; what would they be with one of your quiet kings? Only put me at the head of the guards, see what I would do. Make me Nasakchi Bashi, mashallah! more feet should be beaten in a day than there are now in a week! He was going on at this rate when a ferash came up to him, and said, 'The Shah wants you.' At these words his cap almost by itself returned to its unpretending perpendicular position-his hands left his arrogant hips, and with paleness on his cheek, and a certain laxity in the back sinews of his legs, he slowly followed his conductor. 'God take you into his keeping!' said one, in a titter. 'Wonderful king ing!' said one, in a titter. is ours!' said another. 'If I was a king, men's heads should be like dirt!' said a third. All this did not console him; and when he stood in presence of his royal master, he felt that he would much rather be in the presence of a Russian battery. His principal protection on this occasion was the Shah's own favourable feeling towards him; for although he was a vain boaster and an impertinent babbler, yet he knew him to be brave and zealous in his service. 'And you, dog that you are, said the king, as the Beg appeared before him, who would call your-self mehmander, what were you doing when those under your charge were flying the city, and leaving you behind them to look like a fool and an ass that you are? Give him the stick! Stick you want, and stick you shall have!' He began to roar, to remonstrate, and to entreat; all would not do, his feet soon looked upwards, and his nicely-attired person was not long in performing certain convolutions on the dusted pavement, as he writhed under the sharp blows which fell like hail upon him. His torture was not of long duration, but it had the effect of essentially stopping that constant flow of empty boastings with which he was afflicted, and making him a wiser mehmander."

We must now, however, conclude; and we take part of a conversation among the leading officers of the Shah when he goes to battle against the infidels.

"There was a laugh all around, sorely at the expense of the conceited Beg, who, however, being rather accustomed to this species of raillery, calmly adjusted his beard, gave a rub upwards to his eyebrows, and called for his kalioun. Resuming the conversation, the Serdar said - But if cavalry will not do, we must throw our tuffenkchis, our muswhether, in advance, and destroy every lurking ambush that may be in wait for us.' 'You my well,' exclaimed the chief executioner, as if he were delighted with this thought; 'first ket the woods be cleared by the musketeers, ket the woods be cleared by the musketeers, with his head downwards, and then cut into two equal and then we on horseback will follow sword

Tis thus the Persians would rave in praises of in hand. Praise be to God, you said well." The Zamburekchi Bashi was a short, crabbedlooking old man; his head large, his back rather inclined to hump, and like one of the camels upon which his small iron guns were mounted, sat for a long time in utter repose, quietly chewing the cud of such reflections as might chance to pass through his brain. At length he said-'After all, a zamburek is something. It has burnt the fathers of the Muscovites, why should it not those of the Asterabadis and the Turcomans? Let the Shah only give me an order to take my camels, my gunners, and my fire amongst them, and, jungle or no jungle, I will drive all life out of their heads.' 'Man!' said the Serdar, 'who ever heard of a zamburek in Mazanderan! you might as well talk of devils in Paradise. In the first place, your camels could not make five steps without falling, so slippery and mountainous is the soil, and lucky would you think yourself if they did not all split up in twain like a criminal who has undergone the shekkeh.' 'My camels are not made for splitting up,' said the old general of camel artillery, with some warmth, ' my camels are made for fighting. Did they not scare the Chirkes, the Abkhas, and the Lesgies - not to mention the Russians-out of their wits, when the Shah last marched into Georgia. We threw balls at them with such an aim that we made their fathers dance out of their graves, and made all their old women cry Aman! and see, has not the Shah allowed me to wear a jika on my cap, and a jewelled dagger to my waist, for having hit an ass a parasang off? What words are these, O Serdar! Mohammed Hussein is no such fool either, not to know what he says. Why then shall we not strike these ragged Turcomans, and those less than curs of Asterabadis?' Why then Camels are good things, and iron guns are good things too, said the Serdar, 'and mashallah! praise be to God, the Shah cannot boast of such another good servant as Moham-med Hussein Khan; but neither his bravery, nor his camels, nor his guns, can make a wet soil dry, nor a mountain a plain, nor can he give hoofs to his camels, or prevent them from splitting when their legs part asunder. Is it not so, Shir Khan Beg; you, who know those countries?' The Beg, who had puffed away the little check which had been put to his boasting, again called upon to give his opinion, answered the Serdar, although he looked at the Zamburekchi Bashi, with a most self-complacent air, saying,- 'What words are these?' What fool is there who does not know that camels split up in Mazanderan? I, even I, man as I am, nearly split up myself as I walked over some of their unsainted hills. But I walk in such a manner, different from any body else, that with God's help nothing happened to me; —but, oh, help in Allah! you ought to have seen the horses and the mules how they rolled about. There is the famous Sandûk pass, which we must all go through, where, as sure as asses are not mules, and mules not horses, every one of your camels must split in two, and unless the halves can get up and walk on by themselves, you must leave your guns on the ground, and say Allah akbar, God is great! wallah, billah! By Allah, I say true—if I tell a lie, cut off my head for my pains.' 'And so,' said the Zamburekchi Bashi, anger rising into his face, ' by your account, the Shah must be an ass, his grand vizir must be an ass, and Mohammed Hussein Khan must be an ass, whilst Shir Khan Beg, mashallah, alone must be the lord of wit and the lord of knowledge. Go, go; I spit upon such wit and such know-ledge. The old man, whose chief associates were his camels and their drivers and his gunners, was expected when he spoke to be coarse. therefore his speeches never gave the offence they would have done had they come from the mouth of a more refined person; but, as nothing could convince him that camels did split in Mazanderan, his companions for the present left him to his obstinacy. 'The Khan speaks well,' said the chief executioner. The Shah, who has made war in every region in the world, who was bred and born in Mazanderan, who knows what zambureks are as well as a mollah knows his fatheh, and who has seen more camels than our astronomer stars,-the Shah-may the blessed Prophet take him into his holy keeping ! - the Shah, I say, has ordered the zambureks to be in readiness. Why throw more words into the air? Whose dogs are we to say 'nay' when he says 'yea'? - besides, hear my words-if a camel splits, does it follow that it becomes dust? No; it immediately becomes food; it becomes kabob, roast meat, and so much is saved to the public treasury.' 'Well have you said,' remarked Asker Khan, the commander of the field artillery, a renegade Frank, who had once been a Cuba pirate, afterwards a doctor in the service of an Indian nabob, then captain of an Arabian ship, and lastly general of artillery to the Shah. 'Camel beef is no bad thing when to the Shah. you can get none other. I myself have eaten, n the new world, lion steaks done on a fire of flowing lava, and seasoned with gunpowder!' Indeed !' said all the assembled guests, who, like their countrymen, were always ready to believe any story, however monstrous, about the new world. 'Wallah! by Allah! are there lions in the new world?' inquired one. ' Does fire, then, always come from the earth?' said another. 'Is all the roast meat in the new world made of lion's flesh?' said a third.

'It's all made of lion's flesh,' said Asker Khan, when its not made of alligator;' speaking in a language which was meant to pass for Persian, but which was a farago of English, Persian, Arabic, and Hindoostani words, and so far comprehensible that his auditors interpreted it each after his own fashion. The extraordinary accounts which this personage gave of himself even exceeded the habitual exaggeration of the Persians, but his prowess was so great that he made his words respected and even believed; whilst his knowledge of gannery, which amounted to little more than to point a carronade from the quarter-deck, made him pass for a miracle of science. 'Is it true,' said the chief executioner, 'that in the new world Jews have tails?' 'I never saw them,' said the Frank Khan, 'but I believe it; because I know that in a country called Guatimalo, there is a set of men who wear large bags behind, which serve them for pockets.' 'Ah! said the Serdar, not in the least disbelieving the fact, 'like the animal which was once brought to Shah Seffi, having a pouch in front where it carried its young.' 'Just so,' cried the general of camel artillery, 'that must be true, for our camels wear inside-pockets, where they carry food and water for a week: - it is plain that animals have their inside as well as their outside pockets.' 'Wonderful are the works of Allah!' exclaimed the Serdar. 'What are these things to what I have seen?' said Shir Khan Beg. as if he were oppressed by the invention of some great lie, of which he seemed anxious to be de-livered; 'I have seen the hole in Mazanderan in which Rustam thrust the Dive Sefid after he had almost killed him, and then stifled him by throwing in a whole army, men, and horse, which he first slew and then threw upon him. Talking of pockets, nothing was ever like this hole. When I see a thing, it is not like things which other men see. My things are worth seeing."

We will not, as we have said, interfere with the interest of the story; but simply end with repeating, that this is a most delightful picture of Persia and its manners, and well calculated to afford a perfect knowledge of a singular country through the medium of an excellent fiction.

This, we observe, is Mr. Bentley's first venture after the dissolution of the partnership of Colburn and Bentley. He has only to give the public such works, to be as successful as he will be acceptable to readers.

IT would be the height of presumption to pronounce on an unfinished work; and of the portion we possess of the Refugee we can only say, that it begins amusingly, and that the tale seems likely to be interesting; and proceed forthwith to a miscellaneous extract or two.

The history of an emigrant:

"Madame de Clairville was a widow: her husband, a man of education and good connexions, had been beguiled to leave Paris, his profession of the law, and every thing else which made life valuable to him, for the purpose of following the fortunes of a crazy speculator, who in some most unaccountable manner found means to persuade him that he would find in the wilderness every thing he left in Paris, and a great deal beside. The doctrine he taught was, that the moment approached when man would shake off for ever the degrading trammels of a rusty superstition; in a word, the unfortunate M. de Clairville was induced to join the celebrated Mr. Wimble's settlement on the banks of the Red River. If he had done so alone, the thing would have been sad, but by no means so sad as it really proved. His pretty, gay, happy little wife went with him. Some people, had they seen her in society, in all the gay flutter of animal spirits, might have thought her coquettish; but never did any woman give a stronger proof of attachment than she did, when she left all she loved to follow him. She had one darling child, a girl of twelve years old, on whom she doated with all a mother's fond. ness and a woman's pride. But the pretty Adelaide was to be the heiress of her grand-mother, so Madame de Clairville left her at Paris, and alone followed her husband to the banks of the Red River. They spent much money in a costly but unprofitable outfit, and much more after arriving at New York, in procuring all the commodities with which Mr. Wimble recommended them to adorn the wilderness. On arriving at Perfect Bliss, the name Mr. Wimble had given to his settlement, it was signified to M. de Clairville that he was to hew down a tree, cut it into rails, and fix it as a zig-zag or serpentine fence. The poor Frenchman, whose visions had been of scientific lectures, amateur concerts, private theatricals, and universal philanthropy, was startled; but he bore it well. He did cut down the tree, and though he cut off half a toe in the course of the operation, he bled as patiently as Socrates, and sang Ca ira as he finished the zigwas expected to milk cows every morning standing ankle-deep in water, and moreover to assist in washing linen; when he learned that all the little comforts which he had spent his last thousand franks to purchase at New York, were seized upon, as general stock, and a scanty pittance of necessaries doled out to them at each meal; his gay heart sunk within him, and he would have gladly surrendered half his des-tined term of life, to have passed the other half among the gens d'arme and mouchards of Paris. But he was totally without funds to carry them across the immense distance which divided him from his country, now loved in vain; he had irreconcilably offended his wife's mother, the only wealthy relative they had, by taking her daughter from France; and seeing no chance of escaping from Perfect Bliss, he fell into a deep decline, and died before the end of the year. It is impossible to conceive a situation more desolate than that of Madame de Clairville. On one pretence or another, every dollar they had brought with them had been borrowed, or vested, or subscribed, or begged away; and she literally had not wherewithal to pay the inland postage of a letter to her mother. In this extremity of distress, she recollected a gentleman at New York, who, during the month she had passed there, had shewn her much good-natured attention. To this gentleman, though merely an acquaintance, she wrote, enclosing a letter to her mother, and entreating him to pay the postage of it to Paris. To this letter she never received an answer, but the one she enclosed was forwarded; and after five months of sickening hopes and fears, an answer arrived, post-paid, but without an envelope. This letter contained an order for two hundred dollars, and a promise that an equal sum should be remitted half-yearly; but this was accompanied with a stern intimation from her mother, that if she presented herself in Paris, after making herself the subject d'un roman si ridicule, she would not afford her any assistance or countenance whatever; nor was this denunciation softened by one word of greet-ing from her darling child. Perhaps the com-posure with which the little Frenchwoman bore this, might have been taken by some for want of feeling; but it was not so. She was now, for the first time in her life, called upon to act; and she felt, notwithstanding her tender sorrow for her husband, that she might be able to manage for herself, better than he had done for her-There was still an active principle of hope alive within her; she determined to return to her country and her child, and felt but little alarmed, and not at all discouraged, by the difficulties in her way. The first and greatest of these was to make her way from Perfect Bliss, without letting it be known that she had in her possession what might be turned into dollars; for by that time she had learnt to comprehend thoroughly the theory and the practice of a community founded on the principles of general equality and universal benevolence. On the character of her New York friend she reasoned with all the caution of poverty, and all the finesse of a French woman. He had forwarded her letter and the answer to it, though the doing so must have cost him sundry cents; but he had not written to her, because that would have cost more; ergo, he was a man of business, and careful of his money, but nevertheless was, to a certain degree, benevolent and friendly. To him therefore she again addressed herself, enclosing the half of her letter of credit, which was drawn on a house at New York, requesting him to open a zag. But when he found that his delicate wife running account with her for postage, commis- it very much when I have got a good bonnet.

sion, &c., and desiring, by return of post, ar acknowledgment of the receipt (post paid, or it could never reach her), on the arrival of which she promised to forward the other half, and would request in return a remittance of fifty dollars. Her correspondent was faithful and punctual. He thanked her in the usual form for her business; and from that hour she had no farther trouble as to receiving her little revenue. It is not necessary to follow her in her route up the Mississippi, and the Ohio, across Lake Eric, and so on ; it is enough to say, that she arrived safely at Rochester, and remember. ing the prices of New York, she determined to rest there, till she had amassed enough, by savings from her little income, to carry her again to Paris. Once there, and within reach of her Adelaide, she felt sure, that whether as her mother's heiress, or as a femme de chambre. she should be happy. With this dear hope to sustain her, which seemed like a bright star hanging for ever before her eyes, and pointing the way she was to go, she had lived not only patiently, but cheerfully, weekly adding from her pittance something to swell the sail that was to waft her home."

To this we shall add a brief specimen of feminine dialogue.

" Caroline, partly from her gay nature, and partly from curiosity, began a gossiping conversation with the pretty girls of the house, while the mother set aside the appurtenances of the supper-table. 'Have you lived here long, Miss Euphrosyne?' she began. 'We have been in the bush better than six years,' answered Miss Euphrosyne. 'My!' interrupted Miss Ophelia, 'why, sis, 'tis seven years this fall.' 'And how do you like the life?' 'I expect 'tis pleasant enough by times.' 'Do you see many people?' 'My! I guess not indeed; 'tis sometimes a month out, 'twixt time and time that we sees a human.' 'Do you go to church?' 'No, we ar'n't Christians.' You are not Christians? How is that?' 'Why how can we be Christians, living in the bush so?' 'When Ophelia is married,' said the other sister, 'as she counts to be next month, then I and she will both be Christians; for she is to bide at Avon, and we shall be of the Baptist congregation.' 'And when do you mean to be married, Euphrosyne?' 'Not this year, I expect. I sha'n't be sixteen afore August.' 'And how old are you, Ophelia?' Most seventeen. I should have been married before, only my beau was building a house. I hope sis will be married before she's so old, for I hate old maids.' 'And how do you amuse yourselves here? Do you love to walk in the forest?' The two girls looked at each other, and smiled. 'No, sure,' answered the elder. 'In our country 'tis only the men what does that.' 'I don't expect,' said the other, 'that you would find any American young lady what would demean herself to do just what you did to-night.' 'No? why not?' 'Cause she'd think it quite out of the way to be walking about in the dark with a parcel of men. But I expect the English thinks nothing of it.'
Why, what was I to do, my dear girl? Would the American ladies sit by the road-side all night, instead of walking through the forest to such a nice comfortable place as this?' 'Why I guess they'd lose by that, sure enough; but I never did see an American lady walking in the forest, for all that.' 'Do you ride then?' Sometimes, when father goes to market, we rides in the waggon with mother, to sell the spinning, and to buy coffee and the like.' Are you not delighted to go?' 'Yes, I like

Well, I think I should be delighted, if I had with Firdausi's first adventure after leaving the moment the persons in charge of this pregot no bonnet at all.' 'I expect the English don't mind, but the American young ladies had rather bide at home from July to eternity, than shew themselves when they ar'n't jam.'

We have been much amused by one of the traits of high breeding in Mrs. Trollope's he-

"The next morning, at eight o'clock precisely, the same long table, covered with little plates full of unimaginable cakes, sweetmeats, fishes, cutlets, half-cold steaks, whole-cold ham, and eggs, awaited the descent of Miss Gordon. The gentlemen were all five standing round the fire when she entered; and Mr. Warner, his spirits refreshed by sleep and his morning bitters,' approached her gaily, with the information that they had only waited to have their coffee poured out by her. Now it happened that Miss Gordon had scarcely ever officiated in this way in her life; her evening tea and coffee had always been handed to her by a servant. Upon this summons to the top of the table, she gave a look of whimsical discomfiture to her father. 'I fear, Mr. Warner,' he said, 'that you will think Miss Gordon a very useless young lady, when I confess that I doubt if she ever poured out a cup of coffee in her life.' A silent look passed between the three gentlemen of the family; and the little 'help,' who had just brought in a plate of hot corncakes, was fain to put a portion of her apron in her mouth, to prevent her laughing out at the 'strange woman what can't so much as pour out a cup of coffee.' " Now we really do think she might have tried. Next week we will be more opinionative in onr remarks.

The Shah Nameh of the Persian Poet Firdausi. Translated and abridged, in Prose and Verse, with Notes and Illustrations. By James Atkinson, Esq. 8vo. pp. 608. Printed for the Oriental Translation Fund. London, 1832. Murray; Parbury and Co. Hoci-lan-ki, ou l'Histoire du Cercle de Craie. Traduit du Chinois, et accompagné de Notes. Par Stanislas Julien. 8vo. pp. 149.

TRANSLATION may be called the commerce of the mind; and as the merchant goes into far lands, and brings away their productions wherewith to enrich his own, so the translator carries his researches into other tongues, and transfers what is curious and beautiful to his own. The Shah Nameh, now for the first time brought before English readers, might rather be likened to our own Geoffrey of Monmouth's Chronicles, than to the Iliad: the Iliad embraces but a short period-it has a dramatic unity of purpose, and one paramount hero; the Shah Nameb, on the contrary, has a succession of histories, and though Rustem be the most celebrated, he cannot be called the principal character. Firdausí fell into the hands of the copyists, as Homer into those of the rhapsodists; but he was not equally fortunate in meeting with a Pisistratus to collect his remains. In a sheet so addressed to the general reader, aught of lingual criticism on the niceties of translation would be quite out of character. We shall content ourselves therefore with a few extracts most likely to be universally interesting; and say of the whole work, that its industry and graceful execution must be obvious to the most areless observer, while its learning and knowledge of the Persian will be duly appreciated by the Oriental scholar. We will commence and of himself, to be forwarded to him; but at blessed with a few cups of wine, my fatigue his home.

"When our author had reached the vicinity of the capital, he happened to pass near a garden where Unsari, Usjudí, and Furrokí, were sitting drinking wine. These celebrated poets observed a stranger approach, and one of them said, 'If that fellow comes hither, he will spoil our pleasure; let us therefore get rid of him at once by scolding him away.'
But the others disapproved of this harsh mode of proceeding, and thought it would be better, and more consistent with their condition and character, to overcome him by some stroke of learning or waggery. It was at length agreed among them that each should recite an extemporaneous verse, terminating with a word to which they supposed there were only two other rhymes in the language; 'for doubtless,' said one of them, 'he will be puzzled to find a fourth, and will consequently quickly leave us to our own enjoyments.' Soon after this preliminary step had been settled, Firdausi drew near; and mutual salutations having passed between them, they thus familiarly addressed him: 'Here we are, engaged in making extemporaneous verses, and whoever is able to follow them up with promptitude and effect, shall be admitted as an approved companion to our social board. Firdausí was willing and ready to submit to this test, and Unsarí thus commenced upon an apostrophe to a beautiful woman :--

The light of the moon to thy splendour is weak. Usjudí rejoined:

The rose is eclipsed by the bloom of thy cheek. Then Furrokí:

Thy eye-lashes dart through the folds of the joshun-It was now Firdausi's turn; and he said, without a moment's pause, but with admirable felicity:

Like the javelin in Giw in the battle with Poshun.

The poets were astonished at the readiness of the stranger in producing a fourth rhyme; and being totally ignorant of the story of Giw and Poshun, inquired of him from whence it was derived, when Firdausi related to them the onslaught or encounter as described in the Bastan Nameh. Upon which they treated him with the greatest kindness and respect, and were so pleased with the power and genius he displayed on other subjects, that they recommended him to the patronage of Shah Mahmud; an instance of disinterestedness, if true, highly honourable to the rival poets. It is also related that the sultan, when Firdausí was first introduced to him, requested the poet to compose some verses in his presence; upon which, Firdausí instantly pronounced the following distich:

The cradled infant, whose sweet lips are yet Balmy with milk from its own mother's breast, Lisps first the name of Mahmúd.

This rare compliment delighted the king, and confirmed his high opinion of the extraordinary merits of the poet."

To this we add the last scene, with his sister's touching answer.

"Mahmud, it is said, in one of his twelve expeditions to India, hearing his minister repeat a passage from the Shah Nameh happily decriptive of his situation at the time, was strongly reminded of Firdausi; and recollecting with regret the injustice he had done the poet, inquired what had become of him. The minister replied that he was now very old and infirm, sent entered the gate of Tus, the body of Firdausí was being conveyed through the same gate to be buried. When the funeral ceremony was over, however, the amount was carried to his surviving sister: but she refused to receive it, saying, What have I to do now with the wealth of kings ?' "

We cannot choose a better sample of the narrative parts than the history of Jemshid's marriage.

"The king of Zábulistán, whose name was Gureng, had a daughter of extreme beauty. She was also remarkable for her mental endowments, and was familiar with warlike exercises.

So graceful in her movements, and so sweet, So graceful in ner movements, and so sweet, Her very look plucked from the breast of age The root of sorrow; her wine-sipping lips, And mouth like sugar, cheeks all dimpled o'er With smiles, and glowing as the summer-rose— Won every heart.

This damsel, possessed of these beauties and charms, was accustomed to dress herself in the warlike habiliments of a man, and to combat with heroes. She was then only fifteen years of age, but so accomplished in valour, judgment, and discretion, that Minuchihr, who had in that year commenced hostile operations against her father, was compelled to relinquish his pretensions, and submit to the gallantry which she displayed on that occasion. Her father's realm was saved by her magnanimity. Many kings were her suitors, but Gureng would not give his consent to her marriage with any of them. He only agreed that she should marry the sovereign whom she might spontaneously

It must be love, and love alone, That binds thee to another's throne; In this thy father has no voice, Thine the election, thine the choice.

The daughter of Gureng had a Kabul woman for her nurse, who was deeply skilled in all sorts of magic and sorcery.

The old enchantress well could say
What would befall on distant day;
And by her art omnipoten;
Could from the watery element
Draw fire, and with her magic breath
Seal up a dragon's eyes in death.
Could from the flint-stone conjure dew;
The moon and seven stars as he knew: The moon and seven stars she knew; And of all things invisible To human sight, this crone could tell.

This Kábul sorceress had long before intimated to the damsel, that, conformably with her destiny, which had been distinctly ascer-tained from the motions of the heavenly bodies, she would, after a certain time, be married to king Jemshid, and bear him a beautiful son. The damsel was overjoyed at these tidings, and her father received them with equal pleasure, refusing in consequence the solicitations of every other suitor. Now according to the prophecy, Jemshid arrived at the city of Zábul in the spring season, when the roses were in bloom; and it so happened that the garden of king Gureng was in the way, and also that his daughter was amusing herself at the time in the garden. Jemshid proceeded in that direction, but the keepers of the garden would not allow him to pass, and therefore, fatigued and dispirited, he sat down by the garden-door under the shade of a tree. Whilst he was sitting there, a slave-girl chanced to come out of the garden, and, observing him, was surprised at his melancholy and forlorn condition. She said to him involuntarily: 'Who art thou?' and Jemshid, raising up his eyes, re-plied: 'I was once possessed of wealth and lived in great affluence, but I am now aban-

'He asks only for wine, but I will give him both wine and music, and a beautiful mistress beside.

eside.'
This saying, she repaired towards the gate,
In motion graceful as the waving cypress,
Attended by her handmaid; seeing him,
She thought he was a warrior of Iran
With spreading shoulders, and his loins well bound.
His visage pale as the pomegranate-flower,
He looked like light in darkness. Warm emotions
Rose in her heart, and softly thus she spoke:
Grief-broken stranger, rest thee underneath
These shady bowers; if wine can make thee glad,
Enter this pleasant place, and drink thy fill.

Whilst the damsel was still speaking and inviting Jemshid into the garden, he looked at her thoughtfully, and hesitated; and she said to him: 'Why do you hesitate? I am permitted by my father to do what I please, and my heart is my own.

Y Stranger, my father is the monarch mild Of Zabulistan, and I his only child; On me is all his fond affection shown; My wish is his, on me he doats alone.

Jemshid had before heard of the character and renown of this extraordinary damsel, yet he was not disposed to comply with her entreaty; but contemplating again her lovely face, his heart became enamoured, when she took him by the hand and led him along the beautiful walks.

With dignity and elegance she passed —
As moves the mountain partridge through the meads;
Her tresses richly falling to her feet,
And filling with perfume the softened breeze.

In their promenade they arrived at the basin of a fountain, near which they seated themselves upon royal carpets, and the damsel having placed Jemshid in such a manner that they might face each other, she called for music and wine.

But first the rose-checked handmaids gathered round, And washed obsequiously the stranger's feet; Then on the margin of the silvery lake Attentive sat.

The youth, after this, readily took the wine and refreshments which were ordered by the princess.

Three cups he drank with eager zest,
Three cups of ruby wine;
Which banished sorrow from his breast,
For memory left no sign
Of past affliction; not a trace
Remained upon his heart or smiling face.

Whilst he was drinking, the princess observed his peculiar action and elegance of manner, and instantly said in her heart - This must be a She then offered him some more food, king!' as he had come a long journey, and from a distant land, but he only asked for more wine. ' Is your fondness for wine so great?' said she. And he replied- With wine I have no enemy; yet, without it I can be resigned and contented.

ithout it I can be resigned and conte
Whist drinking wine I never see
The frowning face of my enemy;
Drink freely of the grape, and nought
Can give the soul one mourful thought;
Wine is a bride of witching power,
And wisdom is her marriage-dower;
Wine can the purest joy impart,
Wine inspires the saddest heart;
Wine gives cowards valour's rage,
Wine gives vought to tottering age;
Wine gives youth to tottering age;
Wine gives vigour to the weak,
And crimson to the pallid cheek;
And dries up sorrow, as the sun
Absorbs the dew it shines upon.

From the voice and eloquence of the speaker she now conjectured that this certainly must be king Jemshid, and she felt satisfied that her

When the damsel happened to alight on the garden-wall near the fountain where they were sitting, and began billing and cooing in amorous play, so that seeing them together in such soft intercourse, blushes overspread the cheeks of the princess. who immediately called for her bow and arrows. When they were brought she said to Jemshid, 'Point out which of them I shall hit, and I will bring it to the ground.' Jemshid replied, -Where a man is, a woman's aid is not required -give me the bow, and mark my skill;

However brave a woman may appear—Whatever strength of arm she may possess, She is but half a man!'

Upon this observation being made, the damsel turned her head aside ashamed, and gave him the bow. Her heart was full of love. Jemshid took the bow, and selecting a feathered arrow out of her hand, said-' Now for a wager. If I hit the female, shall the lady whom I most admire in this company be mine?' The damsel assented. Jemshid drew the string, and the arrow struck the female dove so skilfully as to transfix both the wings, and pin them together. The male ring-dove flew away; but, moved by natural affection, it soon returned, and settled on the same spot as before. The bow was said to be so strong that there was not a warrior in the whole kingdom who could even draw the string; and when the damsel witnessed the dexterity of the stranger, and the ease with which he used the weapon, she thought within her heart, 'There can be no necessity for the picture; I am certain that this can be no other than king Jemshid, the son of Tahumers, called the Binder of Demons.' Then she took the bow from the hand of Jemshid, and observed-' The male bird has returned to its former place, if my aim be successful, shall the man whom I choose in this company be my husband?' Jemshid instantly understood her meaning. that moment the Kabul nurse appeared, and the young princess communicated to her all that had occurred. The nurse leisurely examined Jemshid from head to foot with a slave-purchaser's eye, and knew him, and said to her mistress,- 'All that I saw in thy horoscope and foretold, is now in the course of fulfilment. God has brought Jemshid hither to be thy spouse. Be not regardless of thy good fortune, and the Almighty will bless thee with a son, who will be the conqueror of the world. The signs and tokens of thy destiny I have already explained.' The damsel had become greatly enamoured of the person of the stranger before she knew who he was, and now being told by her nurse that he was Jemshid himself, her affection was augmented twofold.

The happy tidings, blessful to her heart, Increased the ardour of her love for him.

And now the picture was brought to the princess, who, finding the resemblance exact, put it into Jemshid's hand. Jemshid, in secretly recognising his own likeness, was forcibly reminded of his past glory and happiness, and he burst into tears.

The memory of the diadem and throne No longer his came o'er him, and his soul Was rent with anguish.

The princess said to him,—'Why, at the com-mencement of our friendship, dost thou weep? Art thou discontented—dissatisfied—unhappy? and am I the cause?' Jemshid replied—' No, she recollected that there was a picture of Jem. pity the sufferings of others, weep involuntarily. brave and magnanimous warriors. Tahumers is by adversity from the splendour of a throne, and reduced to a state of destitution and ruin. But he must now be dead; devoured, perhaps, by the wolves and lions of the forest.' The nurse and princess, however, were convinced, from the sweetness of his voice and discourse, that he could be no other than Jemshid himself. and taking him aside, they said, - Speak truly, art thou not Jemshid? But he denied himself.

Again they observed,—'What says this picture?' To this he replied,—'It is not impossible that I may be like Jemshid in feature; for surely there may be in the world two men like each other?' And notwithstanding all the efforts made by the damsel and her nurse to induce Jemshid to confess, he still resolutely denied himself. Several times she assured him she would keep his secret, if he had one, but that she was certain of his being Jemshid. Still he denied himself. 'This nurse of mine, whom thou seest,' said she, ' has often repeated to me the good tidings that I should be united to Jemshid, and bear him a son. My heart instinctively acknowledged thee at first sight: then wherefore this denial of the truth? Many kings have solicited my hand in marriage, but all have been rejected, as I am destined to be thine, and united to no other.' Dismissing now all her attendants, she remained with the nurse and Jemshid, and then resumed:

'How long hath sleep forsaken me? how long Hath my fond heart been kept awake by love! Hope still upheld me—give me one kind look, And I will sacrifice my life for thee; Come, take my life, for it is thine for ever.'

Saying this, the damsel began to weep, and shedding a flood of tears, tenderly reproached him for not acknowledging the truth. Jemshid was at length moved by her affection and sorrow, and thus addressed her:—' There are two considerations which at present prevent the truth being told. One of them is my having a powerful enemy, and Heaven forbid that he should obtain information of my place of refuge. The other is, I never intrust my secrets to a woman!

Fortune I dread, since fortune is my foe,
And womankind are seldom known to keep Another's secret. To be poor and asfe,
Is better far than wealth exposed to peril.
To this the princess: 'Is it so decread,
That every woman has two tongues, two hearts?
All false alike, their tempers all the same?
No, no! could I disloyally betray thee?
I who still love thee better than my life?'

Jemshid found it impossible to resist the damsel's incessant intreaties and persuasive tenderness, mingled as they were with tears of sorrow. Vanquished thus by the warmth of her affections, he told her his name and the history of his misfortunes. She then ardently seized his hand, overjoyed at the disclosure, and taking him privately to her own chamber, they were married according to the customs of her country."

We conclude with the origin of reading and writing.

"Tahúmers had a vizir renowned for his wisdom and understanding. Having one day charmed a demon into his power by philters and magic, he conveyed him to Tahumers; upon which, the brethren and allies of the prisoner, feeling ashamed and degraded by the insult, collected an army, and went to war against the king. Tahúmers was equally in wrath when he heard of these hostile proceedings, and having also gathered together an army on his part, presented himself before the The name of the leader of the demons enemy. was Ghú. The other demons being taken prisoners, he ordered them to be destroyed; but they petitioned for mercy, promising, if their lives were spared, that they would teach him a wonderful art. Tahúmers assented, and they immediately brought their books, and pens and ink, and instructed him how to read and write."

We congratulate with Mr. Atkinson on the meritorious execution of his most laborious task. The work is dedicated with much propriety to Lord Munster, both as regards his own eastern knowledge, and the interest he has ever shown in the progress and efforts of the Society under whose auspices these pages have been produced.

The Chinese comedy is translated into French, and a curious picture it is; manners, morals, and mind, seem at an equally low ebb. The denouement of the play is a sort of Solomon's judgment. Two women dispute which is the actual mother of a child, who is placed in a circle of chalk; and whoever can drag him thence, the judge avers is to be considered the mether. One forces him violently towards her; the other yields her hold, and pleads that she fears to injure his tender limbs in the contest. The judge points out the natural feeling, and assigns the infant to the actual parent. We conclude by wishing the Society its deserved success; few individuals would or could publish works where remuneration is quite out of tection. the suestion.

An Outline of the Smaller British Birds, in-Persons. By R. A. Slaney, Esq. M.P. 12mo. pp. 143. London, 1832. Longman

WE opened this little volume at hazard, and were rather startled to find our first two sortes produce the kite and the cormorant: if these were the "smaller birds," we wondered what the larger birds could be. But when we came to read it through, we were well satisfied with its contents; for it is one of those contributions of observation and anecdote on a delightful topic, which interests every body, such as we owe to a White of Selborne, Sweet, Selby, Montagu, and more recently to Mr. Jesse. It is not, indeed, so full as either of these; but it is similar in degree and spirit, and altogether a very pleasing book, either for young or old. We select a few extracts to prove this.

"The feathered travellers come and go unnoticed: the southern climates send their visiters to us in the spring; the northern countries despetch their light-winged nations in the autumn. They people our groves, our fields, and the margins of our rivers and lakes; and yet by many they are totally unobserved. To the female sex who dwell in the country, so much at home, and whose walks are often confined to the shrubberies and pleasuregrounds near their dwellings, these beautiful and delicate beings offer a constant source of amusement and interest. Some persons imagine that this is a difficult subject, requiring scientific knowledge and hard names. We can sesure them they are mistaken; and propose to make a few observations on some of our birds, found almost every where, hoping to excite the attention of those attached to rural pursuits. We will first speak of the smaller feathered race, that flit from hedge to hedge, and make our woods and lawns echo with their general, and rather degrading, name of small well speak of the light of the mischievous habits of one or along the road. The following is graphic:—

"Though, undoubtedly, we have no sounds." nation is often carried on against the feathered race-whether hard-billed birds, who devour grain; or soft-billed birds, who destroy gnats. A very slight knowledge of their structure and habits would have saved from destruction almost all the warblers who delight us with their song. Perhaps, if we take a short view of our common birds, beginning with the misselthrush, the largest British songster, and coming down to the golden-crested wren, it may repay our trouble. Within these limits we shall find about seventy birds, varying in size, form, habits, structure, and note; most of which are seen, at one or other time of the year, in the fields and woods which surround our dwellings, and many of them are constantly with us. They may be divided into hard-billed birds, feeding on grain, seeds, and fruits; and softbilled birds, on insects and worms. Some feed on both; and many grain-eaters devour insects, though few of the soft-billed eat seeds. These are again divided into families, from some peculiarity in their formation (chiefly the beak);

as the finches, buntings, warblers, &c.'

After sundry little birds are disposed of, we are told :-

"Another family of summer visiters, the swallows, well deserves our attention and pro-Every one thinks he knows the common swallow, yet many do not know we have four kinds, perfectly distinct in their plumage and habits. The sand-martin, who makes his nest deep-delved in some hanging bank, is not more different from our twittering blue-backed home, almost glided in among them! chimney swallow, than the latter from the loved tenant of the jutting roof, the house-martin; and all easily known from the long-winged active swifts, dark in plumage, circling in calm evenings at a great height, and screaming to each other in their airy race; from their frequenting church steeples and towers, their sombre look, and harsh boding voice, the latter birds have been ominously called in some places 'devilings.' The whole tribe live, and move, and have their being, in the air, and seem less indebted to the earth and the waters than any other of the feathered race. Their lives (for sleep is only 'tired nature's sweet restorer') are spent upon the wing, chasing and destroying the insect enemies of man."

"The arms of a fourth child are known by the addition of a martin or martlet; inasmuch (say the quaint heralds of old times) as that bird, with long wings and very short legs, hath great pain to rise from the earth, so will a self."

In our days a second son might take a martin. But we have come to a sentimental sentence which rather staggers our humane criticism :-

"In approaching any mansion (says Mr. Slaney), we are always pleased with the sight of a number of martins and swallows playing about in security, and which almost indicate the disposition of the owner; as the well-fed sleek cattle, Southdown sheep, and large flock of copper-coloured turkeys near the house, give note of hospitality within."

Now, considering the different treatment for the swallow, and the mutton and turkey for the melody. Most persons are acquainted with swallowers, we cannot think this a felicitous continual and often wanton persecution that all three birds, a sparrow, a robin, and a black. illustration. We would, being at this moment the lower animals are driven from us: and

so interesting to a naturalist as those heard in a tropical forest; yet one, who had not tried the experiment, would scarcely conceive the many different voices of nature, which strike an attentive ear in our own country, and almost at our own doors! Let any of our young friends enter an undisturbed wood or plantation about half an hour before sunset, late in the autumn, and remain awhile concealed and silent. They will find, instead of solitude, they were never less alone! A hundred varied sounds of animated beings proclaim that they live and move! At that time the tribes of night and day animals are both in motion,the one about retiring to their rest, the other coming forth to seek their food! bird reiterates his clear 'clink, clink,' as we approach his domain; the magpie catches up the note of alarm, and repeats it to his fellows; the jay's dissonant scream is heard; and the sluggish crow calls to his old mate that danger is abroad! We remain perfectly still, and the disturbance gradually subsides. The rabbit hops forth, and, rising on his hind legs, looks round to see all is safe. A slight noise in the trees near us attracts our attention. The squirrels watch us with significant gesture, whisking their bushy tails. The weak note of the golden-crested wren calls our eye to the firs seeking his food: the titmice chatter 'good even' to each other. What has alarmed all the small birds? That sparrowhawk, returning a scream somewhat like that of an infant in distress: it is a leveret which the prowling stoat has just seized upon! The partridges call in the adjoining field; the pheasant cocks crow as they fly up to roost: the hen birds we may distinguish by their singular whistle. One, two, three, we may count every bird in the coppice. A sound passes by us like a rushing wind; it is the hurried flight of the redwings, who descend in numbers to their rest: the magpies drop in in small parties, vigilant to the last! We are startled by the fluttering noise of the numerous wood-pigeons, which arrive for a quarter of an hour almost without intermission. The rooks, passing high over us, 'thick urge their weary flight, and seek the shelter of the grove.' The rustle of more rapid wings causes us to look up, and we see the wild ducks making their repeated circles; in each of which they descend nearer their point, till at length they drop into the neighbouring fourth brother, being so far removed from the stream. And, as the mist of night comes on, main branch and the family estate, have much difficulty, without great exertion, to raise him-forth, and the grey owl 'down the lone vale sails away.

Our author is occasionally a little sentimental and speculative.

"We do not see (he says) why the owl, if domesticated, might not be a valuable assistant to the husbandman. If there was one or two belonging to every rick-yard and barn, they would well repay a little trouble; and would be at work when others sleep. The habit of taming birds or other animals is of no little use in forming kind and patient dispositions in the young. Those who have seen the storks in Holland building on the cottage-roofs, and stalking about the road-sides and dykes, will Those who have seen the storks in not think this a hopeless attempt. It is by and their dread might soon be overcome by Those who reside in the kind treatment. country might thus derive a constant source of innocent amusement. Hawks formerly were taught to assist in the chase. [They do so now.] The otter and cormorant have been tamed to fish for their masters, and still do so in India. We have seen numbers of wild ducks flying round a person they were used to, and quacking their joy at his approach with food. Pheasants, in several preserves, come to the keeper's whistle to be fed. Sparrows, and other small birds, will soon approach those who feed them regularly."

As this book is addressed to the female sex and the youthful, we have copied enough to recommend it, as an amiable production; and we need only add, that it is embellished with a good many wood-cuts of various birds.

Cousin Marshall: a Tale. By Harriet
Martineau. 18mo. pp. 132. London, 1832. Fox.

CHARITY has four motives - ostentation, indolence, impulse, and reflection. All will allow that the first three are its most frequent excitements; while to be really beneficial, it must proceed from the last. To be truly serviceable to the poor requires a degree of patience few are ready to exercise, and a degree of forbearance very few possess. We may give away all the blankets in Witney, all the coals in Newcastle, and not benefit those we desire to serve: the feeling of the moment may be gratified by the relief of the moment, but good cannot be called good unless it be a lasting one. It is a great mistake to use poverty as a positive term: there is at this moment poverty in all classes. To one rank it brings mortification; to another want: and every year effects some great change in the position of numbers. It is a common thing to talk of the rich and the poor, as if some absolute line of demarcation existed between them, and that they had always been separate, as the white and the black races of mankind. But the places are continually changing, and the wealthy of to-day may be the destitute of to-morrow. There is no appeal to sympathy like that which touches our selfishness; and the consideration that poverty is common cause may induce attention to the dry-rot now undermining the foundations of society. From the admirable and instructive volume before us we select first the principles it illustrates, and part of a conversation-s true and sad comment upon them.

" In a society composed of a natural gradation of ranks, some must be poor; i. e. have nothing more than the means of present subsistence. Any suspension of these means of subsistence, whether through disaster, sickness, or decrepitude, converts the poor into the indigent. Since indigence occasions misery, and disposes to vice, the welfare of society requires the greatest possible reduction of the number of the indigent. Charity, public and private, or an arbitrary distribution of the subsistencefund, has hitherto failed to effect this object; the proportion of the indigent to the rest of the population having increased from age to age. This is not surprising, since an arbitrary distribution of the subsistence-fund, besides rendering consumption unproductive, and encouraging a multiplication of consumers, does not meet the difficulty arising from a disproportion of numbers to the means of subsistence. The small unproductive consumption occasioned by the relief of sudden accidents and rare infirmi-vided for by charity, since such charity does not tend to the increase of numbers; but, with this exception, all arbitrary distribution of the necessaries of life is injurious to society, whether in the form of private almsgiving, public charitable institutions, or a legal pauper system. The tendency of all such modes of distribution having been found to be to encourage improvidence, with all its attendant evils-to injure the good, while relieving the bad-to extinguish the spirit of independence on one side, and of charity on the other-to encourage peculation, tyranny, and fraud-and to increase perpetually the evil they are meant to remedy, -but one plea is now commonly urged in favour of a legal provision for the indigent. This plea is that every individual born into a state has a right to subsistence from the state. This plea, in its general application, is grounded on a false analogy between a state and its members, and a parent and his family. A parent has a considerable influence over the subsistence-fund of his family, and an absolute control over the numbers to be supported by that fund; whereas the rulers of a state, from whom a legal provision emanates, have little influence over its subsistence-fund, and no control whatever over the number of its members. If the plea of right to subsistence be grounded on the faults of national institutions, the right ought rather to be superseded by the rectification of those institutions, than admitted at the cost of perpetuating an institution more hurtful than all the others combined .- What, then, must be done to lessen the number of the indigent, now so frightfully increasing? The subsistence-fund must be employed productively, and capital and labour be allowed to take their natural course; i. e. the pauper system must, by some means or other, be extinguished. The number of consumers must be proportioned to the subsistence-fund. To this end all encouragements to the increase of population should be withdrawn, and every sanction given to the preventive check; i. e. charity must be directed to the enlightenment of the mind, instead of to the relief of bodily wants. If not adopted speedily, all measures will be too late to prevent the universal prevalence of poverty in this kingdom, the legal provision for the indigent now operating the extinction of our national resources at a perpetually increasing

"" What method? It seems to me that relief is already given in every possible way. 'Ay; there is the mistake, Effingham. People think they give relief in giving money.' I seldom give money,' replied Effingham. 'No; but you give what money will buy, which is, begging your pardon, worse than ineffectual. Now, if you have no objection, I should like to know how much you spent on coals and blankets the first Christmas you settled here, and how much last year?' 'I began with devoting five pounds a-year to this purpose; but it increased sadly. I stopped short two years ago at twenty pounds; but it grieved me to the heart to do so, for more objects remain now unsupplied than I supplied at first.' ' Probably: and are these new applicants strangers from other parishes brought round you by your bounty, or are more of your near neighbours in a condition for receiving charity? Dale reproaches me with having brought an inundation of paupers from a distance; but really our own population has in-creased wonderfully.' 'And the more support you offer them, friend, the more surprisingly they will increase, if there can be any thing ties, is necessary, and may be justifiably pro- surprising in the case. Surely you do not mean elsewhere, in such a manner as to attract the

to go on giving coals and blankets?' can I do? You would call me cruel to withdraw the gift, if you could see the destitution of the poor creatures. I am completely at a loss how to proceed. If I go on, poverty in creases; if I stop, the people will freeze and pine before my eyes. What a dilemma! 'Much like that of government about its pauper subjects. I should recommend the same method to both.' 'To fix a maximum, I suppose; to declare the amount beyond which relief shall not be given? I have tried that, and it does not succeed. Twenty pounds a-year is my maximum, and is known to be so; but every one hopes to have a portion of it, and reckons upon his share nearly as confidently as if all were sure of it.' 'Of course; and there is the additional evil of admitting the principle of a claim to support, which is at the bottom of the mischief. No; to fix a maximum is to unite the evils of the maintenance and the abolition of the pauper system; and both are bad enough singly. If I were you, and if I were the government, I would immediately disavow the principle in question, and take measures for ceasing to act upon it. If I were you, I would explain to my neighbours that, finding this mode of charity create more misery than it relieves, I should discontinue it in the way which appears to inflict the least hardship. would give notice that, after the next Christmas donation, no more coals and blankets shall be given except to those aged and sickly people who at present look for them; and that no new applicants whatever shall be placed on the list, the object being to have the charity die out as soon as possible. 'But I shall be railed at wherever I turn my face. I should not wonder if they pull my house about my ears. very same difficulties on a smaller scale. Friend, you must bear the railing for a time, since it comes as a natural consequence of what you have already done. I am sure so benevolent a man as you would rather endure this personal inconvenience than add to the misery around you. You are capable of heroism in retrieving a mistake, Effingham. As for your house and other property, you must take measures to protect it. You must firmly and gently repress tendencies to violence, which arise, as you now perceive, from an error of your own.' I will consider, resolve, and act; and that without delay, for the evil is pressing,' said Effingham. 'I wish government would do the same,' replied Mr. Burke. 'We hear much of consideration, but the resolve is yet to be made; and how long the act may be in following, it is impossible to guess. Meanwhile, we are going headlong to ruin as fast as you would do if you answered all the petitions for charity which would be brought upon you by unbounded readiness to give. Your private fortune would be gone in a twinkling, and so will vanish our national resources. 'What period would you fix for abolishing the rate?' The best plan, in my opinion, yet proposed, is this :- to enact that no child born from any marriage taking place within a year from the date of the law, and no illegitimate child born within two years from the same date, shall ever be entitled to parish assistance. This regulation should be made known, and its purpose explained universally; and this, if properly done, might, I think, prevent violence, and save a vast amount of future distress. The people should be called together, either in their places of worship or whole population to listen, and the case should works to all classes, and we hope they will be | are much needed; but the delegates were inbe explained to them by their pastors or others. It is so plain a case, and so capable of illustration, that I see no great difficulty in making the most ignorant comprehend it.' 'And yet the details are vast.' 'Vast, but not compli-cated; so the whole might be conveyed in a parable which any child can understand. I think I dare undertake to prove to any rational being that national distress cannot be relieved by money, and that consequently individual distress cannot be so relieved without inflicting the same portion of distress elsewhere. A child can see, that if there is so much bread in a country and no more, and if the rich give some of the poor two shillings a-day that they may est more bread, the price of bread will rise, and some who could buy before must go without now. Since no more bread is created by this charity, the only thing done is to take some of it out of the reach of purchasers to give it to paupers.' 'True: the only real charity is to create more bread; and, till this can be done, to teach men to be frugal of what they have. I happen to know a case which illustrates your doctrine. Owen, who lives in this village, earned ten shillings a-week before the last scarcity. He bought eight shillings' worth of flour for his family, and had two to spare for other necessaries. During the scar-city, he received fourteen shillings a-week from his parish, in addition to the ten he earned; but the price of corn had risen so much that he now gave twenty-two shillings out of his twenty-four for the same quantity of flour; so that he had still two shillings left for other necessaries; and thus, was no richer with twenty-four shillings than he had been with ten.' 'If there had been many such cases,' observed Mr. Burke, 'the price of corn would have been even higher than it was. The best charity to the public as well as to this man would have been to teach him that he had better look after other kinds of food, and not insist on such an abundance of flour. Do not you think he could have understood this? and if he could, why should not his brethren understand the state of the pauper system, and be brought to acquiesce in the measures now necessary to be taken?-If the regulation I have described had been made when first proposed, there would have been much less difficulty than now. If not done now, there is no saying how soon it may be out of our power to do any thing. We are now borne down, we shall soon be crushed, by the weight of our burdens.' 'We must hasten to give our testimony,' said Effingham: 'I, by withdrawing my donations, and declaring why; you, by — but you have given yours, I suspect. I see now the reasons of your resigning your offices at both the charita-ble institutions where I and others took so much pains to get you in. I was more than half angry at it when I thought of our canvass, and all the disagreeablenesses belonging to it; -and all done and endured for nothing. But I see now how it is. I can only hope that your going out of office may do more good than your going in; and what more can I say?' 'Nothing more gratifying to my self-complacency, I am sure, said Mr. Burke, smiling; 'I have had my recompense already in finding that many more than I expected attend to my reasons, and take them into consideration as a matter of real importance. My hopes some-times mount so high as to flatter me that all Great Britain may soon be effectually employed upon the problem - How TO REDUCE THE NUMBER OF THE INDIGENT." We again recommend Miss Martineau's

The History of the Reformation of the Church of England. By Gilbert Burnet, D.D., late Lord Bishop of Sarum. A new edition, with copious Index. 7 vols. 8vo. Oxford, at the University Press.

The History of the Reformation of the Church of England. By Bishop Burnet: with the Collection of Records, and an Index. Revised and corrected, with additional Notes, and a Preface, intended to remove certain difficulties attending the perusal of this important History, by the Rev. E. Nares, D.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford. 4 vols. 8vo. Frontispiece and Portraits. London, J. F. Dove.

WE purposely copy at full length the title pages of these two recent editions of this great work, in order to enable our readers the better to enter with us into some slight analysis of their respective qualities. We are not going, at this time of day, into any thing like a review of Bishop Burnet's History, the merits of which have been too long known and admitted by all parties to need any commendation of ours. But when two editions, each possessing considerable claims to attention, are offered simultaneously to our notice, we seem called upon to point out their peculiar features, if not to decide between them. The first is a reprint, in a handsome and commodious form, of Burnet's own work, just as he left it to us, and executed with perfect accuracy at Oxford, but without any attempt at emendation or alteration, and with the addition only of a new general index, compiled expressly for this edition, extremely copious and accurate, and forming the seventh volume of the work. It is therefore, we think, particularly valuable, as affording a ready means of rectifying any trifling errors into which the author has inadvertently fallen in his early volumes, by reference to the passages in which he has subsequently corrected

Much credit is due to the delegates for the admirable manner in which this index, together with the still more valuable and laborious ones to the works of Strype and Waterland, have been executed: these silent, unobtrusive labours, which save so much time and trouble to others, are the more entitled to our notice and gratitude from the light manner in which they are usually regarded by those who do not know how to estimate their value. It is much to be regretted, that a body of men selected for their learning, talents, and judgment, as best fitted to superintend the Oxford University press, which may well be considered as a great national institution, should so rarely condescend to favour the world with any results of their deliberations, beyond bare reprints of valuable works; the purport and utility of which would generally be much better understood, and often considerably augmented, by a few brief notes or introductions; yet not a word of this kind is commonly to be found in them. To such an extent has this rule been carried, that, by the too strict adherence to it, the public have often, we believe, been deprived of much valuable information actually compiled and prepared for publication. For instance, we have understood, that when the excellent reprint of Sir Walter Ralegh's History of the World, lately published, was first talked of, Southey was anxious to have undertaken the task of editing it, prefix-accessible. The whole of Southey's valuable materials are, therefore, still locked up in his portfolio; and the work appears bare and unadorned, to rest on its own solid merits alone, which are, we fear, too solid for the taste of the day; and is accompanied only by the two old lives by Oldys and Birch, who necessarily go over much of the same ground, and the one often follows the other nearly in the same words for many pages together; whilst, in other instances, their statements are diametrically opposed to each other, and no attempt whatever is made to reconcile these differences, to examine which is right, or to cut out the useless and idle repetitions. This and more has been ably done by Mrs. Thomson; and her work is an indispensable companion to the Oxford edition of Ralegh's works: but why must we have three lives of Ralegh? We must ever lament this infatuation; but whilst we do so, it is but justice to add, that this spirit is passing away, and there have of late been some brilliant exceptions to the general practice. Witness the excellent editions of Burnet's History of his Own Times, by Dr. Routh; of Waterland's works, by Dr. Vanmildert; and Bull's works, by Dr. Burton. But the rule is still too often adhered to; and we must regret, in the instance before us, that these two editions of the History of the Reformation were not incorporated into one, by the delegates having employed Dr. Nares to edit their edition, instead of Mr. Dove's opposition one. It does seem rather inconsistent for one of the professors in the University thus to set himself up against their public press, and offer the weight of his own name against that of his alma mater. are sorry to see it thus employed and thus coupled; the more so, as there is little besides to recommend this edition to notice. It is, to use the technical phrase, got up in the usual manner of these cheap editions. In order to undersell others, the whole of the Records, which in the Oxford edition make three thick volumes, and which are not the least important part of the work, are crammed into one, by dint of small type and double columns, in a style quite worthy of book manufacturing. The index, which in the Oxford edition occupies a volume of nearly three hundred pages, in the other fills only about forty; this being accomplished, not so much by the usual means of small type and close printing, as by the omission of about two thirds. To compensate for these defects, and to make this edition popular with a certain class, we have twenty-two portraits, engraved in a very indifferent style.

It was our intention to have entered at some length on Dr. Nares' preface and notes; but for the latter we have looked in vain, at least for any worthy of notice; and the former, occupying about twenty pages, we do not find of so much consequence as his great name had led us to expect: it is little more than a common-place puff of this edition over every other, as usual; with, however, some valuable hints for a future edition, and some exhibition of the peculiar party views which Dr. Nares is known to entertain concerning this portion of our history. He lays great stress on the errors into which Burnet has fallen, and argues that the historian intended to admit the truth of all the alleged corrections which were sent to him by others, and which, with his usual sincerity and admirable candour, in which surely he was rarely equalled, he has ing a life, which in his hands would have been reprinted at the end of his last volumes, a treat indeed, and subjoining notes, which just as they were received; but in many instances adding notes expressly contradicting them; in others, where he was himself doubtful, or the proof was not at hand, letting them stand, and taking no notice of them. We agree with Dr. N. so far, as that it will be highly desirable to subjoin these supposed corrections as notes at the foot of the pages in any future edition; but by no means to admit them into the text, or acknowledge their validity, without farther proof. We wish that some notes of Swift, similar to the very amusing ones contained in Dr. Routh's edition of Burnet's History of his Own Times, may also be found and appended to a future edition of the Reformation: we are much more disposed to agree in the views of the witty dean than in those of Dr. N., highly as we respect his learning and talents.

On the same plan with the Guide up the Thames to Richmond, this is a neat little volume, with illustrations by Bonner. It is a pretty and useful vade-meenm, to facilitate the stranger's sight-seeing in and about Dover.

Lardner's Cabinet Cyclopadia, No. XXXIV.
Natural Philosophy. Chemistry. By M.
Donovan, Esq. M.R.I.A. 12mo. pp. 407.
London, 1832. Longman and Co.; J. Taylor. THIS excellent and useful treatise may be fairly adopted as a good elementary compendium of chemistry, though the technical names are rather alarming to look at. Here we have described carbazotic, Ausboric, fluosilicic, fulminic, moroxylic, suberie, and xanthogen, &c. acids; alkalinity __zimomin __zirconium __su-perolefiant gas __thorinum, osmazome, and many other hard words, but the definitions do not suit for extract; and therefore we must be content with referring to the volume for information, which will in general be found to be accurate and well digested. We observe, by an advertisement and a substitution, that Mr. Donovan and Dr. Lardner have differed somewhat in opinion on the disengagement of heat in freezing water. Who shall decide? The following passage is not very complimentary to our wisdom, or its organ — yet we must confees that we are not surprised at the calvesheaded-ness of our species.

"The brain has been examined by Vauquelin and John; and, in this difficult analysis, a surprising coincidence between their results may be observed. It is a curious fact, that in the brain of man ne less than 80 per cent of the weight is water. According to the analysis of Vauquelin, 100 parts of human brain consist of 80 parts of water; 4.53 of white fat; 0.7 of red fat; 1.12 of osmazome; 7 of albumen; 1.5 of phosphorus, united with the fats; 5.15 of sulphur, biphosphate of potash, phosphates of lime and magnesia, and other salts. Of such materials is the thinking organ of man composed. The spinal marrow and nerves are similarly constituted. The ratio of water in the brain of the calf is also 80 per cent."

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

THE PENNY CYCLOPÆDIA.

To the Editor of the Literary Gazette.

SIR, — You have lately very ably exposed the monopolising and interested views of the Useful Knowledge Society, and, as I hope, given an effectual blow to the committee-mania of the day. But whilst you wield your powerful pen against the joint-stock speculators in names of note, I am sure you would not willingly injure the prospects of individual enterprise by misstatement or inconsiderate strictures. Allow me, therefore, to draw your attention to an article in your columns of August 25, where the following passage occurs:

"To shew how injurious, in more ways than one, the system of improper competition is likely to prove, we have to mention another penny appearance, called the Penny Cyclopedia, and evidently brought out in haste, to obtain possession of the market before the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge can produce their announced work of the same kind. We thus see that where right is disregarded on one side, moral obligation will be forgotten by others; and the result will not only be disgraceful to the parties, but have an irresistible tendency to deteriorate our literature." &c.

This, sir, is strong language, and such as l will venture to assert is undeserved, if intended to apply to "the parties" engaged on the Penny Cyclopædia now publishing. As I have already declared in the letter I took the liberty of addressing to the Lord Chancellor, as chairman of the committee of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knewledge, and as other disinterested parties were prepared to prove on oath, it was no spirit of "improper competition" that gave birth to the Penny Cyclopedia, which, far from being "brought out in haste to obtain possession of the market before the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge could produce their announced work of the same kind." was projected, determined upon, and in preparation, exactly in its present form and plan, by the present proprietor, at least three months before the Society "announced" or gave the elightest intimation of their having such an idea. Indeed, at the time the work was projected by me, I will engage they had really never thought of to, it being no later than about the third or fourth week of the Penny Magazine, when "the success" of that work could hardly have been so complete and decisive as to have suggested the publication of another work of a similar description. The meeting of the committee at which the projected Penny Cyclopadia was first mentioned did not take place till the 30th of June, about the thirteenth week of the Penny Magazine, and therefore about nine weeks after my Cyclopedia had been in active preparation, and confidentially announced to certain individuals in the trade: nor was the report of that meeting published (and that only on their own wrapper) till a month after this; until which announcement I had not the slightest idea of meeting such a powerful rivalry in the publication I had under-taken. But enough of this, in which I hope I shall be readily cleared of the charge of "improper competition." I come now to another passage, where you enter upon a rather minute out sweeping criticism. "The very first sentence in this Penny Cyclopædia," you say, "is a mistake respecting the first letter of the alphabet, which it tells its readers has three distinct characters of sound, whereas every grammarian knows that it has four."

Now, with all due submission, I venture to question whether our best grammatical anthorities are so unanimous as you declare them to be with respect to the sounds of the letter a. Not to fatigue you with a multiplication of references, I would merely mention the Encyclopedia Britannics, where the same division of sounds is adopted with my own, and Johnson's Dictionary, where the sounds of the letter a are also stated to be three in number, with the very same titles — broad, open, and slender. With respect to the second of these divisions, I take the following explanation from the same high authority: "A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c." Now the usual sound of a in fancy is by no means the same as in fast, the one being more like the a of father, the other shorter, like the a in fen, fat, or your own example at. It will hence be seen, that though the letter a has " three distinct characters of sound," there are also a variety of modifications in each of these divisions, accordingly as the word is long or short, or as the taste of the reader may dictate.

Trusting to your known generosity for the insertion of the present communication in your next Number, I remain, sir, your most obedient servant, the Editor and Proprietor of the Penng Cyclopadia. *

ARTS AND SCIENCES. MR. HOLMAN, THE CELEBRATED BLIND TRAVELLER.

WE have much pleasure in stating, that our esteemed friend, this interesting person, has within the last few days returned to his native country, after an absence of more than five years, during which he has circumnavigated the globe, and travelled on the centinents of Asia, Africa, America, and Australasia, and through the islands of the Mauritius, Ceylon, and Van Diemen's Land. He also, as we have noticed in our Ganette, visited China, besides the islands of Madeira, Teneriffe, St. Jago, Fernando Po, Ascension, Madagascar, the Ley Shelles, Penang, Singapore, and various other remarkable places. We have cause of gratulation, that under his very peculiar circum-stances, and considering the insalubrious nature of many of the countries he has visited, and the hazardous enterprises he must have encountered, he should thus have come back inhealth and safety. When we reflect on the gigantic nature of his undertaking, and the great disadvantages with which he must nece sarily have had to contend, we cannot too much express our admiration of the firmness of character, and extraordinary perseverance, which projected and accomplished what few other individuals would have ventured on, although in the full possession of the whole of their faculties. If in the former publications of Mr. Holman's Travels over the greater part of the continent of Europe, and in Liberia, we met with so many interesting evidences of the acuteness of his observations, clearness of description, and personal adventure, how much

*We insert this letter in justice to the writer; but shall have some comments to offer upon it when we resume the subject of the Useful Knowledge Society's monopoly and interference with individual enterprise, the stimulus to desert, and the source of national wealth.

additional gratification may we not anticipate from these his more recent and extensive peregrinations! Nothing in literature can be more curions

TRAVELS.

A LETTER from Leipsig, of the 15th August, gives us a detailed account of the travels of Dr. Edward Poppig, who commenced his voyage from Hamburg to Cuba in May 1822; went into the interior of the island; and remained some time in St. Theresa Adventura Elena, making collections in natural history. After two years he sailed from Matanzas to the United States; and during a stay of two years and a half at Philadelphia, made preparations for a visit to the south-west coast of America, and also explored the interior of Pennsylvania and part of the Aleghanny mountains. In 1827 he was at Valparaiso, where he met the naturalists and officers of the Siniavin (Capt. von Lüttke), sent on an expedition by the Emperor of Russia. Dr. P. found the neighbourhood of Concom rather favourable to his researches; and thence departed to go by Sant Iago, Santa Rosa, and the chain of the Andes, to Mendoza. Some of his mules being unfortunately swept away by one of the violent mountain-torrents in Ajos de Agua, he lost all his travelling apparatus, and was consequently obliged to give up his intended visit to Mendoza; and, after a short stay at Rio Colorado, to return to the coast, and eventually to Talcahuano. Hence he set out for the province of Isla la Laja in the south-east of Chile, still so little known to naturalists. From Antuca, a small place at the foot of the cordilleras, this country—exceedingly rich in plants—was minutely examined; and the Pico de Pilque, the most considerable mountain in the vicinity, as well as the volcano of Antuco, were for the first time ascended. The latter is 2750 feet above the line of snow, and possesses the very singular peculiarity, that the volcanic explosions are regularly repeated every four or hive minutes. Having returned to Conception, our traveller embarked for Callao in May 1829; and from Lima he hastened over the steepest parts of the Peruvian Andes (the lofty Sierra Vinda, and the Cerro de Pasco, which has rich silver-mines), to the banks of the Huallaga, where he remained a considerable time in Pampayaco, near Cocheros, the extreme point of the journey of the celebrated Spanish botanists Ruiz and Pavon, and then went to the mission of Tocache, situated still further up the same river. In September 1830 he went further towards Yurimagnas, in Maynas, and remained there ten months. In August 1831 he commenced his voyage across South America, upon the Marannon, Solimoes, and Amazons; and happily arrived at Para. April 23, 1832. The happily arrived at Para, April 23, 1832. The troubles in the interior of Brazil allowed only a short stay in Ega, the last place visited by Spix and Martius on the west of Brazil - and also at the Barre do Rio Negro. From Para our traveller is gone southwards to Colares, leady, if there should be any danger of popular insurrection, to embark immediately, but at all events in the course of this year, for Europe.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Memoirs of celebrated Naval Commanders: illustrated by Engravings from original Pictures in the Naval Gallery of Greenwich Hospital. By Edward Hawke Locker, Esq. F.R.S., F.S.A. Harding and Lepard.

WE regret to find that this interesting work has suddenly come to a termination; and we regret still more the principal cause assigned, namely, "the declining health of the author, which obliges him to limit his labours to a single volume." "The original plan of the work," observes Mr. Locker, "would have extended it to at least four volumes ; and these memoirs, when chronologically arranged, and illustrated by the whole series of pictures in the gallery of Greenwich Hospital, would have presented a connected history of the royal navy of England, in a biographical form."
It is certainly much to be lamented that so comprehensive a design has thus been contracted.

Mr. Locker congratulates himself, however, and with justice, on having succeeded beyond his hopes in the formation of a Naval Gallery. It was in the year 1823 that he first proposed the scheme; and by great personal exertions he had the satisfaction, in the course of three years, to see the walls of "the Painted Hall" covered with portraits of most of the distinguished naval commanders, and representations of their actions. The recommendation of Lord Farnborough (ever ready in the promotion of any liberal or tasteful undertaking) induced his late Majesty to command that the whole of the naval portraits in the royal palaces of Windsor and Hampton Court should be removed to Greenwich, and to contribute several valuable pictures from his private collection. To the same kind and powerful influence the gallery was also indebted for four large historical paintings, recording the principal victories of the last war, which the directors of the British Institution ordered to be painted and pre-sented to the Naval Gallery. Lord Farn-borough, with many other liberal donors, have presented all the pictures which have been since added to the collection.

National Portrait Gallery. With Memoirs by William Jerdan, Esq. F.S.A., &c. Part XII. Fisher, Son, and Co.

ever desirable variety of this kind, it is not always that it can be secured. Of the first of the noble lords it is observed by the writer, to whom the proprietors express their obligation for this memoir,—" With the broad domains of his predecessors, his lordship has inherited their exalted sentiments—their love of liberty-their talents, and their zeal. By descent, by education, by association, a Whig, -the Tories, in their most triumphant career, have found in his lordship an able, uncompromising, and dauntless foe: at a period when many shrunk from the contest appalled, and more in despair, Mr. Lambton resisted, inch by inch, the march of power; and by his eloquence, his boldness, and his resolution, did much to impede its progress." Among other interesting anecdotes of Lord Gardner, it is stated, "that when only nine years old he was wounded on his father's deck, in the Duke, which he commanded on the glorious twelfth of August." In speaking of Dr. Parr it is frankly admitted, - " of this learned and distinguished individual, who for so long a space occupied a prominent station in the scholastic, political, and theological world; who engaged so ardently in literary controversy; who searched so pro-foundly into the hidden intricacies of classical criticism; and who devoted himself so sedulously to all the business of an active life, though so much of it was passed in the closet and library - we feel that we can give only an outline sketch, the filling up of which would require volumes instead of pages."

It is but strict justice to say of the plates that they are admirable. The portrait of Lord Durham, especially, engraved by J. Cochran, from a picture by Sir T. Lawrence, is one of the most spirited and brilliant heads we ever saw. There is also great delicacy and sweetness in the portrait of Lord Gardner, likewise after Lawrence; and extraordinary force of character in that of Dr. Parr, from a picture by Chisholm.

Gallery of Portraits. No. IV. Knight. NEWTON-Michael Angelo-Molière! Illustrious names! Illustrious all; but one alone imperishable. When the hand of time shall have swept every trace of the works of the artist from the face of the earth-when the language of the wit shall have become obsolete, and his allusions unintelligible-the sublime discoveries of the philosopher will shine in all their pristine splendour; or, rather, will receive that additional glory which the researches of future ages will no doubt shed upon them.

The heads, particularly that of Molière, are skilfully executed; and the biographical notices are drawn up with perspicuity and talent.

Gallery of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours. Part IV. Tilt; Colnaghi, Son, and Co.; J. and A. Arch.

s the Exhibition of the Society of Painters in Water-Colours is indisputably one of the most pleasing and interesting of the various exhibitions which are annually opened in the metropolis, so the publication under our notice is indisputably one of the most pleasing and interesting of the various publications of a similar character which are at present in progress. In contemplating the works of our painters in water-colours, taste and patriotism are equally gratified. We admire them as fine productions of the pencil; we are proud of them as produc-A STATESMAN, a warrior, and a scholar, — in tions of the British pencil, in a line of art pecutions of the Strish pencil, in a line of art pecutions. The contents of the fourth Part are: "Scene from Twelfth Night," painted by J. M. Wright, rom I weith Night, painted by J. M. Wright, engraved by F. Bacon; "Evening," painted by G. Barret, engraved by W. Radclyffe; and "Yarmouth Roads," painted by J. S. Cotman, engraved by A. R. Freebairn. It would have been impossible to select three subjects more strikingly characteristic of the respective styles of the three able artists by whom they have been produced. The drawings themselves we have mentioned with the praise which was their due, in our notices of the exhibitions of the Society; of the engravings, we cannot speak more highly than by saying that they do ample justice to the drawings.

Views of the Old and New London Bridges: the former in its last state and demolition; the latter during its erection and in its finished state. Drawn and etched by Edward William Cooke; with historical Descriptions by an eminent Architect. Part I. Brown. This is a publication of great interest, not only to the architect and the antiquary, but to every person of taste and feeling in the country. On looking over it, we were forcibly reminded of a passage in Burns' " Brigs of Ayr'

"Midd Brig appear'd of ancient Pictish race,
The very winkles Gothic in his face:
He seem'd as he wi' Time had warsti'd lang,
Yet teughly doure, he bade an unco bang.
New Brig was buskit in a braw new coat.
That he, at Lonon, frae ane Adams got."

Change the name of the architect, substitute Rennie for Adams, and the description is complete. Mr. Edward William Cooke, by whom the plates have been drawn and etched, is a son of Mr. George Cooke, and is evidently "a chip of the old block." His style is precisely that which delights us: sufficiently free without being careless; sufficiently finished without being niggled. His points of view are well chosen; and his figures and other accessories are introduced with spirit and skill.

Illustrations of the Bible. By John Martin. Parts III. and IV.

"THE Deluge," "The Death of Abel," "The Covenant," and "The Destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah," are the four subjects treated by Mr. Martin in these two parts of his fine publication. They possess the same grandeur of conception and power of execution which we have so frequently noticed in this able artist's works; and exhibit in all its varieties what he himself has justly called, " his method of availing himself of all the objects afforded by inanimate nature, as well as by the passions and ingenuity of man, of bringing before the eye the vast and magnificent edifices of the ancient world, its forests, wilds, interminable plains, its caverns, and rocks, and mountains, of freely employing the aid of those powerful and primitive elements of air and water, which, when agitated by their ALMIGHTY DISPOSER, (using the language of the poet,)

'Between the green sea and the azure vault sets roaring war.'"

Illustrations of the Surrey Zoological Gardens. Drawn from Nature on stone, with descriptive Notices by W. H. Kearney. Part II. Schloss.

EXECUTED with great care and neatness. The attitude and expression of the Vicugna, and of the Negro Monkey, are singularly happy. Of the latter Mr. Kearney says: "In manners it approaches nearer to the ourang-outang than any other of the tribe to which it properly appertains; consequently we see in it a greater ingly apparent: for instance, it will endeavour | shee, P.R.A., that deserves the attention of to arrange the rugs which are given it to sleep upon, and cover itself over with them; it pushes from it any person or object that annoys it; and appears inquisitive to examine what is passing on the outside of its cage. When it looks from out [out from] its bed, raising with its hands the rugs under which it always sleeps, its appearance is truly that of a diminutive negro, and the intelligent expression of its countenance assists, not a little, the comparison. It is perfectly inoffensive, and indeed affectionate, suffering itself to be carried about, and apparently courts the attention of those who notice it.'

Her Imperial Majesty Alexandra, Empress of Russia. Engraved by Poselwhite, from a painting by G. Dawe, R.A. Louise Marie d'Orleans, Queen of the Belgians.

THE first of these portraits is the 93d of the series published in La Belle Assemblée. When we saw the large print from the same subject, we considered it one of the best of Mr. Dawe's works in point of composition. Of course that quality is preserved in the pretty little plate under our notice, and the reduction of size has produced a great concentration of effect. Of the beauty of her Majesty of Belgium, which is an additional illustration in the number for the present month of the same publication, we are not courtiers enough to speak highly.

Instructive Gleanings, Moral and Scientific, from the best Writers on Painting and Drawing; arranged as a book of reference to the pupil and amateur, and containing much information for professional students. By Rowland Mainwaring, Capt. R.N. London, Longman and Co.; Baldwin and Cradock; Simpkin and Marshall: Meyler, Bath.

WELL does the compiler of this volume deserve the thanks of the profession for the concise and able way in which he has brought into view the philosophy, the morality, and the utility of painting and drawing. scarcely any thing connected with art, or its professors, an application to which will not be found in the passages Captain Mainwaring has quoted; derived as they are from the writings of those who have thought deeply upon their subject, and given to the public the result of their own practice, experience, and observation. In his introduction the writer states, "That this selection was made, in the first instance, only with a view to the amusement and instruction of himself and children; but, as in the progress of gleaning, the development opened to him such a field for improvement of the mind, and such a profitable source of occu-pation for a leisure hour, after much consideration, and many doubts as to his own sufficiency, he resolved to communicate the results of his labours to the public, and to address them more particularly to that portion of society on whom few can look without feelings of deep interest the youth of the rising generation.

The subjects connected with art are placed under their different heads, and the authorities cited are Richardson, Reynolds, Barry, Opie, Fuseli, Hoare, Gilpin, Burnet, Dagley, Hassell, &c.

In this judicious arrangement will be found, as the author very justly says, "not only information on the subjects of painting and drawing, but many beautiful sentiments and opinions, that are applicable to every individual, whatever his profession or occupation."

every artist; and as we have frequently had occasion to lament the misapplication of talent on subjects of a trifling, disgusting, and sometimes of an immoral tendency, we are happy in the opportunity of transferring to our own pages, from the present volume, the opinion of the president on the proper application of talent. "There is no character in society so dangerous or reprehensible as he who devotes his talents to licentious purposes; who deliberately endeavours to shake the foundations of social virtue, and set the passions at war with morality. He who, without the plea of passion or temptation, in the calm retirement of thought, can dedicate his powers to the service of vice, is a viper that envenoms the purest pleasures of society, and betrays the sacred cause which Heaven, in giving him talents, committed to his charge."

Equally applicable are these remarks to writers who prostitute their powers to calumny or licentiousness. Upon the whole we recommend this volume, not only for its utility, but for the amiable view which it presents of the disposition and character of the writer. book is dedicated to his brother-officers, in an address which does equal credit to the head and heart of Captain Mainwaring. Further, it is well printed, and got up in a good style.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

BEN BUSKIN.

[Every body writes like Tom Hood now.] BEN BUSKIN was a fat young man, An actor, too, was he-A very great one in his line, Which eke was tragedy; Though sometimes funny parts he took, Falstaff he was no muff in, Which, like the feast-scene in Macbeth, He acted without stuffing !

His forte e'en was light comedy, Though fourteen stone he weighed; And being of a roundish build, A beau he sometimes played. As Hamlet, in the fencing scene

He always made a hit; And when he died he surely drew The pity of the pit.

The more he played the jealous Moor, The more his scenes would tell: Well known his Stranger was, because He filled the part so well.

That he would munch four pounds of beef, He rumps and dozens laid; He ate the stakes, and then the " lean And hungry Cassius" played.

Now Cupid often had essayed With love to make him flutter-But found his heart was like a pear Stuck in a cask of butter. So, finding all his longest bows Too short the feat to do, He shot him with a lovely belle, Who measured six feet two.

One night when he was on the stage, He glanced into the pit, And thought he saw a pillar move, With a bonnet huge on it. He looked again, and soon perceived What did a post appear, Was casting sheep's-eyes upon him,

While he was acting Lear.

Although no post was Mrs. Pole. Whose glances shot so far, Ben straightway longed long Mrs. Pole Should be his polar star!

While walking out next year, he saw
A shadow by his side;
And looking up, a furlong off,
His dear long Pole he spied.

A run he took, and shortly reached His long long-wished-for prize: "And pray," said he, "glance down upon A wretch who for thee dies!" Said Polly Pole, while looking round,

"Did any body speak?"
O, yes!" cried he, "'tis one who dares
Your highness' smiles to seek."

[The next three stansas paint the mal-apropos appearance of Mrs. Pole's husband, a tall soldier.]

And now Ben went to Polly Pole,
To try to animate her;
So walked from Pole to Pole, just like
A circumnavigator.

In vain Ben tried to quell his rage:
Pole said, with many an oath,
"If 't warn't that I'm a life-guard's-man.
I'd be the death of both."

And with a stick to Buskin's back
Some heavy blows he lent;
And, though a sergeant, treated him
With corp'ral punishment!
Against the wings poor Ben's fat sides
The sergeant's stick impales;—
To those who saw his back he seemed
A very Prince of Whales.

The sergeant then took Polly Pole,
And in his hand he caught hers,
And dragging off his better half,
He lodged her in his quarters.
Though Ben had stood against Love's shaft,

He couldn't stand Death's dart:
The sergeant broke poor Buskin's bones,
And Polly broke his heart! W.

BIOGRAPHY.

DAVID BLAIKIE, ESQ. W.S.

WE have to record the sudden death of this gentleman, with feelings of the most acute nature. He was educated to the law in Scotland; but having a marked turn for literary pursuits, he became the originator and editor of the Edinburgh Evening Post, and afterwards of the Edinburgh Literary Gazette, of the merits of which namesake we have not spoken more highly than they deserved in our own Journal. On Sunday last, about noon, he was seized with cholera; and sunk under this appalling malady at five o'clock on Monday morning. And melancholy additions have been thrown upon this calamity by domestic circumstances and other afflictions. Mr. Blaikie's widow, having been moved to Grove House, Brompton, the residence of Mr. Jerdan, was safely delivered of a daughter at one o'clock on Friday morning, within twelve hours of her husband's funeral. But a young and esteemed friend was even before this hour added to the tragedy. - Watt, George Watt, Esq., the only son of -Esq. late surgeon in Aberdeen, a fine young man, of the fairest promise, and with every prospect of auspicious fortune before him, died after five hours' attack on Thursday. He went to Grove House at ten o'clock, to accom-pany Mr. Jerdan to their late friend's burial; but became so unwell, that Mr. J., fearing the effect upon his spirits, dissuaded him from attending, and advised him to seek medical aid and retire home. He did so about eleven o'clock, and by five he was a corpse.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

NOCTES WESTMONASTERIENSES. — NO. III.
"Come like shadows, so depart."—Macbeth.

Our circle now began to increase rapidly. Euripides soon appeared, but with an expression of considerable vexation in his countenance. On the cause of his discomposure being inquired by Shakespeare, he replied: " Oh, it is only my incessant tormentor Aristophanes, who, because he wrote one foolish play, which the more foolish Athenians applauded, called 'the Frogs,' thinks he has earned an eternal right to croak at me and my tragedies." "Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Aristophanes, who had approached unperceived, and overheard his victim's complaint. "You see, Shakespeare, that I am not unlike your own Falstaff - not only witty myself, but the cause of wit in others. would have believed that I could have struck a spark from the dull pate of Euripides?"
"Come, come, thou prince of buffoons," said Shakespeare, "if possible, be serious for once, an thou canst." "Serious!" cried the other; "oh, I can be as serious as my old friend Socrates - that is, when I have hemlock to drink instead of the nectar that Anacreon and I got drunk upon last night; and, by the fount of Castaly! we laid Ben Jonson under the table before we had half done. You moderns are not half such stanch carousers as we of old. Ah, Sheridan, my jolly old dog, how are you? you are not one of the degenerate, at any rate."

The two comic poets here embraced each other with a cordiality which could not have been exceeded had they been acquainted a thousand years, and then, much to the relief of Euripides, they withdrew arm in arm, having, apparently, some very important matter to discuss—at least, if I might judge from the unwonted seriousness of their faces. This I afterwards understood (for not having agreed together, they referred it to the decision of a grand conclave of dramatic poets,) was the relative merits of their comedies, as exhibiting the manners of the times in which they lived.

My readers will, I am convinced, pardon the minuteness with which I record the little characteristic traits and sallies of men whose very names are now held sacred. Even the failings of great men receive a lustre from their virtues, as the dark ravines of a mountain do not entirely exclude the light of heaven, but are illuminated by reflection from the brighter and more prominent parts.

But to return from this digression. Racine having now joined us, the conversation turned upon the subject of the entertainment which they had lately witnessed; and an animated discussion ensued, as to which was the more consonant to nature—the romantic or the classic style. Some sharp skirmishing ensued between Shakespeare, Racine, and Garrick, in which the French dramatist contended stoutly for the supremacy of the Aristotelian laws concerning unity, whose authority the English poets refused to allow, affirming that they were not founded in nature, but only derived from the observation of the practice of the authors who had preceded him. "In fact," said Garrick, "had Aristotle been an Englishman, and written after the death of our friend Shakespeare, I am persuaded that he would have maintained that his ' native wood-notes wild' were the ne plus ultra of dramatic regularity." "I should like to ask him that," said Racine; "but I do not see him here to-night: I shall, however, take the first opportunity of questioning him on the sub-"You may save yourself the trouble, Racine," said Shakespeare; " for I hardly think you will get him to agree with you. It appears to me, indeed, that the only unity which he insists on is that of action. What say you, Eschylus?" "Nay, now," replied the venerable old Greek, "I have never thought about the matter; I was too much engaged in composing tragedies to think of rules; but I don't think Aristotle could have derived them from me, for I never observed any. I was wrapt in a divine inspiration, nor could devote my soul to any object except what would aid in developing my preconceived idea. To say the truth, Racine, methinks your rejection of the chorus and rhyming declamation are as little consonant to the rules of Aristotle, as Shakespeare's assert. ed violation of the unities. I say asserted; for if he has infringed them, so have I. In my Eumenides I make my hero one moment at Delphi, and shortly after he appears at Athens." "A Daniel! a second Daniel come to judgment!" cried Garrick, delighted at finding so powerful an ally. "Come, confess, Racine, that your rigid adherence to these supposed rules, not only restricts you in your choice of your fable, but leads you often into monstrous absurdities, such as causing a conspiracy against the life of a monarch to be plotted and matured in his very palace, in the ante-chamber to his cabinet. where there are a million chances to one against the traitors escaping being overheard. I think the presence-chamber at St. James's would be about the last place that Guy Fawkes and his confederates would have chosen for their rendezvous." "Why, it is as easy," said Racine, " to fancy that, as to imagine myself to be in England during one scene, and in the next to be transported into France, without having the least notice given me as to my change of country. To tell the truth, when I witness one of your English plays, I am sadly in want of some interlocutor to act the part of a finger-post, and direct me to my destination-or, at least, to have the condescension to tell me where I am. I would advise you to have the names of your places painted on your scenes, so that no one might run the risk of making a mistake.' 'I see your aim, Racine," said Shakespeare: "I confess that I have been most wantonly licentious, and as capricious as my own Robin Goodfellow, in that matter. Still, however, in both of us these are but minor faults, though they do somewhat mar the verisimilitude of our action. The main object of the dramatic poet is to strike the heart of his auditors, and, by the naturalness of the passions depicted, to awake those feelings in them of detestation of vice, and love of virtue, which would be the effect of proper consideration of examples occurring in the actual world. If we succeed in doing this, if we can awake the slumbering embers of patriotism by the exhibition of a Brutus, or curb the unruly struggling of ambition by that of a Macbeth, our ends are answered; and if by our efforts the world has ever been spared the infliction of another Nero, or the youthful criminal been checked in his mad career, we have done that which more ennobles our glorious art, and which wreathes our brows with more unfading laurels, than all the transitory and fleeting applause of the multitude. But Racine and you, my good Euri-pides, have not yet told us your opinion respecting Master Knowles's ingenious play, which we witnessed but lately." "Indeed, to say the truth," said Euripides, "I am scarcely well able to judge; for never having entered a barb..... pardon me, I mean a modern theatre before, I was rather dazzled and confounded at a scene so different from our Athenian theatre; and it took me several minutes before I could collect my thoughts. I was well pleased with the story, although more homely than our ancient subjects. Not being well versed in modern manners, I was obliged to seek explanations of many allusions ;-nay, so ardent is my desire to make myself acquainted with your literature, that I have even read the play. It was a novelty, indeed, to me to witness the performance of females: I should never have conceived them capable of exhibiting so much "We know very well," said Shakespeare, "that you never entertained a very high opinion of the fair sex: but I should imagine that you have now had ample time to revise your sentiments on that point." "Why," replied Euripides, "I will allow that I was blinded by prejudice and" "If the truth " interrupted Shakespeare, " I were known, dare-say that your having been slighted by some fair Athenian dame was the first cause of your unceasing acrimony against the sex. Hine illa lachryma. Come, confess, was not that the case?" "Pshaw! this is trifling," said Euripides, sullenly: "but to return to our subject. There is one thing which I very much admire in your modern theatres-and that is, your dispensing with the mask. Our enormous buildings rendered them necessary, and compelled us to exaggerate every expression of the features, in order to render it visible to the more distant spectators. The consequence was, that we lost all the finer shades. all the nice gradations, by which one passion runs into another, and were obliged to content ourselves with a mere rude outline. I was very near yielding the palm to you moderns when I saw Miss Kemble's countenance as she pronounced the two words, 'Do it!'" "That was, indeed, inimitable," said Shakespeare: "but you should have seen Mrs. Siddons in my Lady Macbeth; her personation of it fully equalled-nay, almost surpassed-even my conception of the character. Many and many a time my friend Garrick and I have sat and listened in rapture to her. Have we not, David?" Garrick assented. The conversation then turned on the decay of the drama. and its causes: this discussion, however, will form the subject of another paper.

DRAMA.

STRAND THEATRE.

ANOTHER novelty, founded on the Belle Stratagem, and called What is She at? has been successfully produced at this little and enterprising theatre.

A young lady, Miss Marian Taylor, has made a most successful début at Worthing, in the part of Cherubino in the Marriage of Figaro. She possesses every requisite for the stage—youth, good looks, and figure; and a most pleasing speaking and musical voice.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

Haymarket, Aug. 27 .- In the Rent Day a chair should be accidentally pulled to pieces, and a hidden treasure be thereby brought to light; but on the first night of the piece's performance here, the chair had only half learnt its part—that half was the concealment of the formance here, the chair had only half learnt its part—that half was the concealment of the treasure: its development seemed utterly hopeless, till Vining, in a manner wholly destructive to the illusion of the scene, singly anatomised the chair, amid the laughter and hisses of the chair, amid the laughter and hisses of the additions.

Aug. 29.—Mrs. Humby is the queen of practical joke. In the Beggar's Opera, having knocked Macheath's hat out of his hand, she nourished by the publication of Irving's Alshortly afterwards attempted to smack his face; hambra and Bulwer's Eugene Aram. shortly afterwards attempted to smack his face; but the gentleman, his first appearance on any stage, declined, and evaded the proffered honour. The disappointed lady then consoled herself by giving his hat, which was lying on the stage, so violent a kick as to deposit it upon the footlights, from which perilous situation it was rescued by the bow of a generous fiddler. If Pollys would consider, that to enter Macheath's prison they must have walked through Fleet Market, they would not, perhaps, sport the white satin shoes, séduisant sleeves, &c. &c. which they now affect. The hornpipe was danced by Mat o' the Mint, drest as a sailor. Farren in the Hunchback, when he came to the passage wherein he tells Julia he has loved "Well as I myself had been your father," began the line "Well as you yourself had been," and just escaped making the lady her own father, by the hasty substitution of the words " my daughter."

Westminster Theatre, Sept. 1 .- Mr. Dibdin Pitt, who has taken this theatre, keeps up an enviable spirit, in spite of the scantiness of the audiences (which vary nightly from ten to fifteen individuals), by lugging in references to the emptiness of the house, and the failure of his speculation, in every character he perso-

Strand Theatre, Sept. 3 .- In the new opera the old songs are dragged in, not only without the slightest reference to the piece, but often at direct variance with the situation. Thus a lover, on finding that all his fondest hopes are gratified, strikes up, "To death, 'mid burning' sands, Arbaces flies." The English of some of the actors here is sufficiently edifying; but their Latin is irresistible: Forrester spoke of a voxi preterii nihil.

VARIETIES.

The Byron Gallery. -We have seen the drawings by Mr. Richter for the plates which embellish the Second Part of the Byron Gallery, to which we alluded in the Lit. Gas. of the 11th of August; and it is but common justice to say, that they are exceedingly beautiful. It must be very difficult for any engraver to reduce such drawings to the necessary size and yet preserve their excellence.

Agricultural Employment Association .recent meeting respecting the allotment of land to relieve and lighten London poors' rates, it was contended that no portion of Epping Forest could be appropriated to this purpose. But surely, for so good an end, some fitting ground near the metropolis may be obtained.

M. Douville. - This pseudo-traveller, it is reported, is about to make another excursion to Africa. He proposes to land on the west coast, in about 14° south latitude, and travel to 25° east longitude from Paris, between the parallels of 13° and 15° south. In conclusion, he intends to take a north-east direction, and return to Europe, if possible, by Egypt or Mozambique. This route is, consequently, several hundred miles to the south of his former pretended travels.

Pleasurable Sensations in getting Drunk .-"The consequences of drunkenness are dreadful, but the pleasures of getting drunk are certainly Medical Bulletin: Medical Bull.—" Illness of Scarpa. This illustrious anatomist and surgeon, now at a very advanced age, has recently recovered from an attack of illness, so severe, that by the last accounts from Italy his life was despaired of."—Medical Gazette.

William Tell in Petticoals.—At a recent shooting-match at Lucerne, Mademoiselle Aloise Mager, aged fourteen, was among the most able shots; her aim was unerring, and she was received with acclamations in the society of the carabineers.

Taking a Farm.-A large portion of the cliff at Cromer fell into the sea about a fortnight ago, which accident a provincial paper describes by telling us that the sea had taken a farm of seven acres. Yet we dare say we shall never hear of the corn waving upon it.

The Difference .- There has been a grand political Tityrus and Melibous sort of ecloque at Birmingham, between Mr. Attwood and Mr. Cobbett; in which the former maintained a theory for every body to pay every body, and the latter a theory for nobody to pay nobody. Strange to say, the newspapers state that Mr. Attwood had ten of the auditors on his side to one on the opposite.

Vesuvius. The late eruptions and flow of lava, we are told, have cut up the roads by which the mountain was ascended.

Delicate Affair .- The Limerick Herald contains an account of a seducer being caught in the worst possible situation with his friend's wife, and almost murdered by him and his servants; which it heads as a "Delicate Affair." Does this apply to the adultery, or the shocking treatment of the adulterer?

Amber Spectacles .- Among recent patent inventions is one for making spectacles of amber, which is described to be very agreeable to the eyes, and, when rubbed, to the nose also.

The Sub-marine .- Mr. Deane, whose diving exploits we have frequently mentioned, is about to visit the long submerged wreck of the Royal George, at Spithead.

THE DRAMA.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee appointed to inquire into the Laws affecting Dramatic Literature. Pp. 242. Report on the same. Pp. 3.

[Unpublished.]

"GREAT inconvenience," says a notice at the head of these parliamentary papers, "great inconvenience having arisen from the publication of minutes of evidence taken before committees. and of papers, &c. laid before them, it is particularly requested that members receiving such minutes and papers will be careful that they are confined to the object for which they are printed, the special use of the members of such committees."

On the present occasion, however, it will be obvious that no inconvenience can arise out of our availing ourselves of a copy of these Minutes for public information and discussion, inasmuch as the evidence itself was listened to, and, in substance, canvassed by every person in London interested in the subject. At any rate, as it yields another proof that the laws can be vio-lated with impunity, we may just as well add our "contempt" to the common stock of disobedience, especially when the purpose is to benefit the drama and dramatic literature of

As our own remarks on this amusing inquiry will fall better into the ranks as we quote and refer to opinions on different points, and perhaps at the conclusion of our extracts, than in the way of prefatory essay, we shall at once proceed with very little introduction to the matter in hand. Suffice it to say, that a petition for the repeal of those statutes by which the two large theatres, Drury Lane and Covent Garden, claim the monopoly of performing the regular drama, having been presented to the House of Commons, the question was taken up by the distinguished Author of Pelham, Devereux, and Eugene Aram, &c., and a select committee, of which he was chairman, appointed to investigate it. In doing this, it seems to us that they set out in error, by not calling for the patents under which the major theatres assume the privileges contended for; and even at the end of the inquiry we feel the want of these necessary documents, of which the very existence is rendered doubtful by these proceedings, since de non apparentibus et de non existentibus eadem est ratio; and more than doubts have often been expressed of the actual preservation and possession of these foundations of dramatic monopoly. These patents are said to be dated 15th January and 25th April, 1662, fourteenth of Charles II., and to give to Sir William Davenant and Thomas Killigrew, and their heirs, &c., the exclusive right of building each a theatre, and of acting plays in London and Westminster.

The committee first sat on the 13th of June last, when Mr. Mash of the Lord Chamberlain's office, and Mr. Winstan, were examined; and ceive all scripture is much too sacred for the no more idea of something, than Eve had of met from time to time, so as to have twelve meetings by the 12th of July, when it terminated its curious labours, which were lightened, as our readers will find, by several rather droll scenes and dialogues. And, in order that they may the sooner appreciate this, we shall commence with the examination of Mr. Colman, the examiner of all theatrical entertainments under the Lord Chamberlain, which took place on the fourth day, June 20, when Mr. T. Duncombe was in the chair. "When a play is submitted to you for examination (he was asked), how do you proceed upon it? The examiner is a very subordinate person, and no further interferes directly from himself with the managers than by recommending them to omit any passage palpably exceptionable, and all oaths as well as all religious expressions and allusions too sacred for the stage.' I observe previously in this statement, ' the lord chamberlain is the licenser, to whom the examiner forwards an outline, and sends his opinion of the entertainments which he has officially perused, and then the lord chamberlain signs or does not sign the form of license, as he may think proper.' I may observe here, that as to sending an outline, that is a voluntary act, because my predecessor never sent any outline; but I thought it might be more satisfactory, and I have gratuitously sent that at my own expense, that the lord chamberlain might see what the subject of the play was. - What do you consider palpably exceptionable, that is at your own discretion? It must be very gross and palpable to every body before I should interfere. I allude to political and personal allusions, downright grossness and indecency, or any thing that would be profane, which any candid man could not but say was improper, about which there could not be two opinions.. The committee have heard of your cutting out of a play the epithet 'angel,' as applied to a woman? Yes, because it is a woman I grant, but it is a celestial woman. It is an allusion to the scriptural angels, which are celestial bodies. Every man who has read his Bible understands what they are; or if he has not, I will refer him to Milton .- Do you recollect the passage in which that was struck out? No, I cannot charge my memory with it. I do not recollect that I struck out an angel or two, but most probably I have at some time or other. Milton's angels are not ladies? No, but the scripture angels are ladies, I believe. If you will look at Johnson's dictionary, he will tell you they are celestial persons, commanded by God to interfere in terrestrial business. - Supposing you were to leave the word 'angel' in a play or farce, will you state your opinion as to what effect it would have on the public mind? It is impossible for me to say what effect it would have; I am not able to enter into the breasts of every body who might be in gallery, pit, or boxes.—But you must have some reason scriptural personage.—Must an allusion to play also you talk of Eve, there is a very good scripture have an immoral effect? Yes; I con- joke about Eve; one of the characters has stage, except in very solemn scenes indeed, and that to bring things so sacred upon the stage becomes profane.—What would be the result of using ordinary oaths, such as damme, or any thing of that sort? I think it is highly immoral and improper, to say nothing of the vulgarity of it in assemblies where high characters and females congregate; I certainly think it is highly improper, and beyond that, I believe you will find there are acts of parliament where swearing is restrained under a penalty. - Do you speak from your experience as to the immoral effect, or is it your opinion merely? It is my opinion of the practice in general. I have seen a great deal of the stage undoubtedly, and so far I can speak from experience. I think nobody has gone away from a theatre the better for hearing a great deal of cursing and swearing .- How do you reconcile the opinion you have just given with your making use of those terms, such as damme, or any of those small oaths which you say are immoral and improper, to say nothing of their vulgarity, in some of your own compositions which have met with great success on the stage? If I had been the examiner I should have scratched them out, and would do so now; I was in a different position at that time, I was a careless, immoral author, I am now the examiner of plays. I did my business as an author at that time, and I do my business as an examiner now .- Do you suppose that those plays of yours (which were so pleasing to the public, and are acted still with great success, from which you have not the power of erasing those small oaths) have done much mischief to the morals of the town? They have certainly done no good, and I am sorry I inserted the oaths. As a moral man, one gets a little wiser as one goes on, and I should be very happy to relieve my mind from the recollection of having written those oaths. —Do you mean to say you regret being the author of John Bull? No, that is a different thing; I might not be sorry to have made a good pudding, but if there are any bad plums in it, I should be glad to have them out.—But do not you think that what you call the bad plums contributed to the success of the piece? No, certainly not; it is from habit the actors think it hammers the thing stronger if they use a 'damme,' for which they are liable to 40s. penalty. I will give you an instance in one of my own plays. Habit has made it forcible and strong to say 'damme;' but if 'hang me' had been substituted, it would be as strong; that is perfectly harmless to me, though not to the person hanged, and it would be quite as forcible to the audience. Sir Simon Rochdale, in John Bull, says, 'Damme, if it isn't the brazier!' Now, putting a gentleman in that position is wrong, in the first instance, morally so; if he happened to make a mistake, and it was not the brazier, he would be damned. Now, if he said 'Hang me, if it isn't the for erasing it? Yes, because it alludes to a brazier!' would not that do as well?-In that pin-money. Do you call that improper? Yes, lieve any body has been telling us about the murders upon the modern stage more that had better be omitted.-But the audience are always struck with that? Yes; but I think all allusions to the scripture had better be avoided; and recollect, I only recommend to the managers to leave it out; if they do not choose to leave it out, I say nothing further about it. My directions to them, if directions they can be called, begin, ' Please to omit the following underlined passages,' and they do omit them or not as they please."

Mr. Colman is elsewhere interrogated "What is your salary, exclusive of fees? The examiner's nominal salary is 4001. per annum, but the deductions from it (the chief part of them reverting to the government as taxes) are no less than 311. 8s. per cent, so that the actual salary is 2741. 8s. annually; a sum scarcely adequate, without the fees, to the labour of the business as now executed, and the constant residence in or near London. In what way is that 311. 8s. levied on your salary? I have not got the documents, but there are a great many deductions for taxes, and some fees in the different offices, the exchequer and the treasury. - That does not amount to 31%. 8s. per cent? Yes, 31%. 8s. per cent each year. There is a tax which is called, wrongfully in this instance, the land-tax, but it is levied on my place in the same ratio that the land-tax is levied, although I have no land except the flower-pots out of my windows; and of the 311. 8s., the chief part goes to the landtax, as it is called. I forget exactly to what that amounts; but, however, the whole deduction is 311.8s. per cent. I have not got the particulars here, but I can furnish them to the committee if required."

"Do you know what the fees received by you last year for examining plays amount to? I do not know. The year before last the number of plays was 111, which makes it double that number of guineas.—You do not receive any fee upon any thing that is not licensed? Certainly not.—Suppose a poor author should bring you a very excellent work, and he should represent that this fee was more than he could conveniently pay? I hope I should not be deficient in charitable feelings on such an occasion, besides my esprit du corps in favour of dramatists.-But you certainly would not in such a case at all impede the granting of the license on account of not receiving the fee? No, surely not; God forbid that I should. If I met with any person to whom two guineas was an object, I should certainly withhold the claim; but in general I ought to have my fees. I think Dr. Johnson mentions somewhere in his Life of Addison, that Addison was very scrupulous as to his fees; he would not give them up to his friends, and the reason was, because two guineas was very little to them individually, but made a great difference to him in the aggregate. - You do not receive more than 400%. a-year after all deductions? I may have made at times nearly 500%. It is somewhat ameliorated since the Frenchmen came. Whenever there are more theatres there is more emolument, and therefore in point of dry and sheer interest, I ought to argue stoutly for there being twenty theatres in London, but my conscience will not permit me to say that; I believe there are too many already.—Have you received 2001. in fees in any year? Yes.—Three hundred pounds? No, I think not.—Are lectures in astronomy subject to your examination? I think every thing on the stage ought to be. The Duke of Montrose thought so, and astrostars lately.—Are Mathews's entertainments quently than the ancients had.—You licensed? Yes, certainly. The last part, the most, adultery, murder, parricide, &c.; Monopolylogue, as he calls it, is a farce, or (I not those crimes the results of the passes.) beg his pardon) a comedy. It is a regular dramatic piece, but he acts all the characters himself? That is licensed? Yes. It is submitted to your examination? Yes .- Are oratorios licensed? Yes; in the Duke of Montrose's time they were, and I think ought to be now; not for the sake of the fees .- Why? Because I think they are horribly immoral things.-Immoral oratorios? Yes; it sounds like a contradiction, but it is so. If you read the Biographia Dramatica, you will find there is one mentioned as scandalously immoral.— Did not Mr. Hawes resist the Lord Chamberlain, in the case of Joseph and his brethren? Yes; a license was granted to him, and he would not pay for it, and he placarded me in the newspapers.-Was the license refused or granted? The license was granted, and he would not pay the fee, but he placarded me and blackguarded me; and that set me, at five minutes' leisure I had, upon calculating the amount. He said, if the precedent were admitted, God knows what expense future oratorio-makers and undertakers would be subjected to. I calculated what it would be, and I believe it amounted altogether to no more than four guineas in two or three years.-Did you prohibit his playing it? No; he played it, and chuckled at his triumph, and sung and roared away. His oratorio went on; he had his license, and I had not my two guineas. Was the performance withdrawn? No; it took place.-Then it appears dramatic performances do take place without paying the fees? Highway robberies do take place, but it is contrary to law."

"Are you not in the habit not only of licensing dramas, but songs, prologues, and epilogues; do they not require a special license? Yes, it is so stated in the act of parliament; but prologues and epilogues are generally sent with the dramas to which they belong, and they are all lumped in with the drama, unless they are sent afterwards .- If any alterations are made, would that require a fresh license, and would you demand another fee? Nothing on the stage is to be uttered without license. You would demand another fee? Yes, to be sure, if there are material alterations. I do not mean to say if you alter a word or two. They do it ad libitum.

"You say, (and they continue to bother the licenser sadly relative to the grounds on which, and the way in which, he performs his official duties), in the paper which you have given in, that a piece was brought forward at Paris, in which incest, adultery, murder, parricide, &c. formed the groundwork; do you consider you would be perfectly justified in refusing to license a piece in which those crimes were introduced? No, not precisely that; let me see how the plot thickens. I should not refuse to license the murders of Richard III. and so on; but when it comes to such things as human nature and morality shudder at and revolt against .- Does not human nature and morality shudder at Macbeth, if we can suppose morality to shudder? Yes; but it is a matter of history.-Do you mean to say in those cases you would only withhold the license to those plays which seem to have justified such acts, or do you mean from the mere introduction of the thing? Exactly; things incest, adultery, murder, parricide, &c.; ar-not those crimes the results of the passion upon which the interests of great dramatic per formances is founded? Yes, in some in stances.-Would you wholly exclude them No; nor are they excluded in general. It is only where there is something so shocking as to justify it.-Would the mere introduction of any thing that is shocking, justify you is censuring or refusing your license to tha performance; or is it only its being intro duced in such a manner as to seem to justif or encourage the crime itself; would th mere introduction of it be sufficient? reason of suppressing every thing of tha sort is, that it may make a bad impression on the people at large. It is impossible t answer so comprehensive a question. must depend upon the discretionary powe of the Lord Chamberlain; and I have alread shewn how far it is from the wish of th Lord Chamberlain to object.—You only refus your license to such things as tend to justif or encourage crime? Certainly.—Have you any idea of what you should consider political! wrong? Yes, certainly; any thing that ma be so allusive to the times as to be applied to the existing moment, and which is likelto be inflammatory.-You would think unde a Tory administration, any thing against the Tories would be wrong, and under a Whit administration, any thing against the Whigs I should say to the manager, 'I do not pre tend to interfere, but you had better not allow it for the sake of your theatre, as you wil have a row in your theatre.' It was but the other day the word 'reform' was mentioned and I understand there was a hubbub.— Where was that? At all the theatres.—In the exercise of your censorship at the presen moment, if the word 'reform' should occur you would strike it out? No; I should sav I think you had better omit it; I advise you to do so for your own sakes, or you will have a hubbub. There was a play or Charles I. you refused to license? Why did you refuse to license that? Because it amounted to every thing but cutting off the king's head upon the stage. So does Julius Casar? Yes, but not in that way. If you took the trouble of reading the two plays, you would see the difference. There is a discretionary power in the Lord Chamber. lain.—Is it all a matter of discretion and caprice? Yes, it is the discretion of the Lord Chamberlain. Or a caprice? You may call it so?"

"Do you think performers always adhere to your corrections? I believe so .- Do you ever take any measures to enforce your correction? No, I have no ulterior power; if there is any necessity to enforce them, it is the Lord Chamberlain who must do it. If I thought they were going too far, I should certainly represent the case to the Lord Chamberlain, and he would act at his discretion.-You never send any body to ascertain whether your corrections are observed? I need not do that; I have occupation enough not to volunteer that; I have plenty of information on the subject."

We come next to the questions respecting the number and size of theatres, and other considerations in which the success of the drama is concerned :-

" Do you think the legitimate drama can be The Duke of Montrose thought so, and astromind really to justify murder.—Either to Have they been licensed at that time.—
in that seem to any reflecting or dispassionate better performed at Covent Garden or Drury mind really to justify murder.—Either to justify or encourage it? Yes. We have —With regard to comedy, do you think legitimate comedy can be better played on the large cause of it? I do not know: they are exstage of Covent Garden than on the smaller tremely industrious; and the cause is from the stage of the Haymarket? Yes; they have a better collective company trained to that style of acting, which is not the style of the minor theatres. - Suppose the company were put upon a smaller stage, would not a comedy appear to as great advantage at the Haymarket as Covent Garden ?- I think if theatres are so large that you cannot see and hear, smaller theatres are preferable.—Do you consider that to be the case at Covent Garden? I am near-sighted, and I cannot see so well there certainly.-Can you hear as well? Whenever I go, the managers are very kind, and they have placed me in a private box near the stage, where I hear well enough. Can those hear who sit in the centre of the house? I never did sit in the centre of the house.—Which do you prefer as an author? I should wish every body to see and hear, except those who are inclined to -Now, as an author, would you like John Bull or the Iron Chest to be played on the Covent Garden stage, or the Haymarket, by as good a company; which stage would do your composition most justice? I should say, perhaps, one is too large, and the other too small: I am speaking of my own Haymarket theatre. With reference to the present theatre, I have never been in it.—Have you ever been in the Adelphi? Yes.—Should you prefer Covent Garden or the Adelphi? should say the Adelphi was too small. Which would you prefer? I have not turned that matter in my mind: the next play I write I will consider of it.—Will you answer the question with reference to the plays you have written : suppose you had the choice of performing John Bull or the Iron Chest at Covent Garden or the Adelphi, which would you prefer? I must hesitate about that. If I sent it to the Adelphi, I should wish it on a larger scale than it is at this moment; and with a view to my profits, I should wish it much larger ... But to do justice to your composition and powers as an author, would you choose Covent Garden or the Adelphi? With a view to merely seeing and hearing, I should perhaps choose a less theatre than Covent Garden, and a larger theatre than the Adelphi; something between them."

" Do you think the legitimate drama being played at all the minor theatres within the bills of mortality would operate beneficially or otherwise to the drama in general? If I am asked my private opinion, I am afraid they would injure themselves.—Never mind themselves; what effect would it have on the drama in general, or dramatic literature? If those who are to conduct the affairs of dramatic literature are to injure themselves, I cannot think dramatic literature itself would be benefited. If all the concerns fail which are to perform the drama, what is to become of dramatic literature itself? It would go to the dogs along with the rest.—What injury do you apprehend would result to the patent theatres if the legitimate drama were allowed to be acted at the minor theatres? It might draw audiences from one place to another, so that none of them would have audiences sufficient to pay their expenses. -Should not you think it would increase the number of persons who like to go to theatres? I should doubt it. If people have not a relish for going to two theatres, I do not think that relish would be increased because there are twenty.—To what do you attribute the loss of money which every year takes place at Covent Garden and Drury Lane? I think it is a horrible ruin, there is no doubt .-- What is the taste of the town being very much altered, and from a change of habits. For instance, gentlemen of the description I have the honour of talking to, go to dinner about the time of halfprice, and therefore they are not the supporters of theatres; that is the generality; there are some amateurs.—Do you think the theatres should be kept open two hours later? No; what is to become of your other customers, the tradespeople? if they are to be kept up as long as fashionable people, they would not be able to open their shops in the morning.-Do you think the tradespeople support the theatres? I think the greater part of the audience consists of visitors to London, people who have come to see the lions, foreigners, and so on."

The lions here spoken of are not the Lions of Mysore; and with this pertinent hint we must for the present break off; having, with other theatrical matters in other parts of this sheet, far exceeded the space proportioned to one branch of intelligence. We shall resume the Minutes; upon which measures of much consequence to the stage and to the lovers of the drama will in all probability be founded.

Illustrations of Modern Sculpture: a Series of Engravings, with descriptive Prose and illustrative Poetry. By T. K. Hervey. No. I. London, 1832. For the Proprietors by Relfe and Unwin; Tilt; Moon, Boys, and Graves. POETRY, Painting, and Sculpture, have long been deemed sister arts; but it remained for the present day to draw yet closer their bonds, and call upon the poet to be the oracle of the dreaming world of the painter and the sculptor. The task of illustrating the exquisite marble fashioned by Canova, Flaxman, and Westmacott into beauty, has been confided to Mr. Hervey; and his verse is like one of those silvery fountains over which of old bent the graceful statue, or beside which rose the carved urn. Fanciful and luxuriant, his poetry is marked by the number and beauty of its similes; sorrowful thoughts arraying themselves in the images of all they see; as if he wrote in the very spirit of the ancient poet, who says,

When I am sad, to sadnesse I apply Each herd, each tree, each flower that I pass by." His fault is profusion - he often weakens an exquisite image by surrounding it with half a dozen inferior ones. We quote the "Dancing Girl," a beautiful poem, though somewhat marred by this over-richness. We scarcely need point the attention of our readers to the pathos of its conclusion.

"The spirit of the dance is past,
An'—like a bird, whose fainting wing
Has travelled all too far and fast,
And from its wandering stoops at last,
To seek an earthly spring—
With folded frame and weary heart,
The gentle girl reclines apart! The gentle girl reclines apart!
The spirit of the dance is past,—
Burnt out, like flame, before the blast,
That withers by its keen careas,
And dies amid its own excess!
The bounding soul of mirth is o'er,
The inpulse that so bright and high
Shot up—like rocket-lights that soar,
As if to reach the sky,
But turn amid their starry flight,
And fall—though, still, they fall in light!—
So,—beautiful, but chastened, now
Appears the baffled girl,
Though something of a spirit-glow
Has faded from her languid brow,
Amid the mazy whirl!—
But things that are of mortal birth
Are dearest with a look of earth!
And thus—oh! thus it still must be And thus—oh! thus it still must be With human hopes and wings, That leave too far and soaringly Their own allotted springs;

That, like the Cretan boy's, lure on
The trusting hearts that wear them,
And melt before the very sun
To which their feathers bear them!
Oh! thus with earthly feelings all,
The song that saddens while we sing,
The censers in the festive hall,
That darken from the light they fling,
That waste the more, the more they warm,
And perish of their perfumed charm,
Are types of life's each frail delight,
That cast their feathers in their flight. That cast their feathers in their flight, Or on their own sweet substance prey, And burn their precious selves away!"

There are some delightful touches; for example, speaking of a mother's love,

- All the idols of her soul
- Are gathered into one."

 "Echo, the shadowy voice that, as it flies, Tells only half its tale, and that in sighs."

The innate desire of the heart for "things that are not" gives its own truth to the following passage from "Mercury and Pandora:"

wing passage from "Mercury and Pandora
"The mind has no to-day!—the present things
Are for the senses,—never for the soul;
Backwards or forwards, on its restless wings,—
An eager traveler, without a goal,—
It flits for ever!—seeking out the lore
Of things to come, in things that were before;
Stealing the taper from the old world's tomb,
To light it through the future's deeper gloom!
It is the hidden principle of soul,
Which will not sleep amid a noon of light,
Which ponders still upon a doubtful scroll,
And spurns the lessons that a e read at sight;—
Which, more than present waters, loves to hear
The music of an unexen fountain play,
And, better than the trumpet in its ear,
The cho of a trumpet far away!"

We also add the conclusion.

"And such a tale of her, the Titan's bride,—
A child of earth, but coloured by the skies!—
Ere man had reaped the flery fruit of pride,
(Like Hæmon, taught, by sorrow, to be wise,)
Wao—if she shed the tempest—wore a form
That—like a rainbow—beau if led the storm;
Who—if she came to wound—remained to heal,
And what she brought of sorrow, stayed to feel;
To kiss the polson from the memory's smart,
And smile away the Mara of the heart!
Who, in her dowry of celestial things,
Had all an angel's gifts, except its wings;
And sits, with Hope, beside the stream of life,
To gather healing from its hour of strife,
Or walks, in beauty, where its demons throng
And lays the spirits with her low sweet song!
—'Tis ever thus!—alas! Ilfe's purest springs
Still nourish, in their bosom, reptile things,— Grief still is cradled in the heart of joy,—
But golden gifts repay their own alloy!
Oh! welcome are the hues that Iris wears,
Though half her beauty is made up of tears;
And joy—had woman filled the world with night—
Wo stayed, hernelf, to charm it back to light!" " And such a tale of her, the Titan's bride.

We cannot but hope this beautiful work will meet with the encouragement it so richly deserves.

A Letter on the Importance of settling the Sandwich and Bonin Islands on the Plan of a Proprietary Government, &c. By T. Horton James, Esq. 12mo. pp. 24. Lond. 1832. Or the legality or expediency of Great Britain taking possession of and colonising the Sandwich and Bonin Islands we are not competent to judge; but there are many matters in this small pamphlet of such general interest that we only do our duty in bringing them under public observation. Mr. James, it appears, has recently returned home from a voyage round the world, during which he spent some months among the Sandwich Islands; and we lament to say that his account of them is of the most melancholy description. "Ever since our illustrious countryman (he says), fifty-three years ago, completed this last and noblest of his discoveries, the Sandwich Islands have been gradually retrograding in happiness, population, and productions; and from 400,000 fine athletic people in Cook's time, they have now dwindled down to about 75,000 souls, hardly able to obtain food, and groaning under a missionary tyranny of American enthusiasts.

worse even than that of Dr. Francia in Para-Elsewhere he adds: " The daily depopulation of the islands, owing to the existing tyranny, will, it is to be feared, leave in a few years the country without inhabitants. But surely it is better that an English system should be introduced, and tillage commenced, while there are yet a few thousands of the natives left for the purpose, strong and willing to work, than that we should wait until the islands are a desert, and then have to import the natives of other countries to do the labour." And in the notes we find the details of the evils which the author represents, still more forcibly insisted upon in detail. James not a man of observation and character, we would express our hope that such a state of things did not exist. We, however, quote him.

"It is extremely painful to be obliged to say so much against the American missionary system, as I found it existing in these highly favoured islands. Whilst travelling in Europe, the writer had always been friendly to the cause, and had been also no mean contributor to missionaries generally to the South Seas, and therefore visited the various groups of islands quite prepossessed in favour of them; but truth compels him to say, that the personal observation upon the spot, of the effects produced by the conduct of the American missionaries in the Sandwich Islands, wrought on him a sad and melancholy disappointment. No doubt, among so numerous a body as the American missionaries there are many very valuable men, who would do honour to any employment they might be engaged in, and among these I have great pleasure in recollecting Mr. — in Owyhee; but 'exceptio probat regulam;' and it is to be regretted such instances are not more numerous. The system of exacting a Spanish silver dollar from every black man and woman before the missionary will marry them, is certainly not one of their instructions, and is highly oppressive among a population that can hardly obtain a dollar by any exertions, coupled as this priestly regulation is by a summary denouncement against all those who cohabit together without the form of marriage. A sermon which I heard in the Island of Woahoo was frightful; it was something in these words: 'You will go to the horrible place of torment in everlasting flames, unless you rely solely on our Lord Jesus Christ. It is no use your being honest, no use your being sober, feeding the hungry, and healing the sick, and leading what the world call a virtuous and upright life one towards another; all this, I say, is of no use; you and your children will be cast into the fiery pit, which burneth for ever and ever, the bottom of which is paved with the little bones of infants not a span long!' I would ask any body if this is the way to begin with people in a complete state of nature? The preacher was a young man of about twenty, that had just arrived from the establishment at Princeton, in New Jersey; but it is to be hoped that he will follow in the path so abundantly set before him by his elder brethren, and end with the same amount of discretion as he has now of zeal, and thereby accumulate, as I was informed the head missionary, but ci-divant chair-maker, has done, twenty thousand dollars' worth of property in his house at Honoruru! No wonder the population is gradually falling off, when, added to this system of frightening the people, and charging them a dollar for getting married, they are compelled to attend to church and school four days out of the seven, and the

the purpose of tillage and growing their necessary food. The missionaries have prohibited fishing, bathing, Jews'-harps, and the surfboard, and every other description of amusement among the native population; besides which they have introduced an old law of the Connecticut puritans, and will not allow an English or American gentleman to ride on horseback on Sundays, or drink spirituous liquors, or play at bowls or billiards on any day in the week; whilst they themselves are driven about the town and about the country, four-inhand, with their wives and families, Sundays and working days, not by horses, which are plentiful and cheap enough in those islands, but by human beings, by four naked black fellows, their own hearers, and probably fellowcommunicants! The missionaries wanted to proclaim the ten commandments of Moses as the supreme law of the land throughout the islands, but some difficulties were started, and the plan was abandoned. In short, civilisation, as it is unfortunately going on at present in the Sandwich Islands, under the mismanagement of the American missionaries, is only another word for extinction. The bulk of the people are in a state bordering on starvation, because the adults are taken away from their enclosures of taro and potatoes to learn to read and spell; thus beginning at the wrong end,-and the time that should be devoted to the agricultural and mechanic arts, is now fruitlessly wasted in teaching old men of seventy to spell a b ab! and where one naturally looks for the outward signs of industry, the spade, the hoe, the fishing net, &c. there is nothing but a vain and idle exhibition of the palapala, or spellingbook, bought of the missionaries at a high price. In fact, the whole system, with an honourable exception or two, is nothing but a money-making fraud, and, instead of tending to the benefit of the wretched people, may be considered almost as a visitation of wrath, and a direct cause of the depopulation before spoken of. First, by a tax on marriage, much above the means of nine-tenths of the people, which tax is not received by the king or government, such as it is, to be disbursed and circulated again, but goes directly into the pockets of the missionaries, to be hoarded by them, and taken out of the country when they have sufficiently feathered their nests; and by denouncing eternal torments on those who marry according to the ancient usages, that is, without paying a dollar to the reverend fathers. Second, by starvation; employing the natives four days out of the seven in useless school-learning, or otherwise taking them from the cultivation of the soil. Third, by disease; prohibiting bathing, which in that climate is almost as essential to existence as fresh air; the natives, from being the fine healthy people they were in Cook's time. are now covered with vermin and scorbutic eruptions. Fourth, by prohibiting their innocent sports, and by fruitlessly attempting to bind human beings to a mode of life which is contrary to their nature, their spirit is broken, and they have now become listless and enervated; and should the present system continue, there will ere long be none but the white population for the missionaries to preach to.

Having shewn the frightful decline and the unfortunate state of this fine group of islands, the author in other parts contends for their commercial importance, and the common desire of the population to be placed under British rule; for which he recommends either a po-chiefs; thus leaving only two whole days for merchants of London, in the manner which the Argentine Republic have lately granted the entire property of the Malouines, or Falkland Islands, to Monsieur Vernet, on his undertaking to convey a certain number of emigrants to that spot; and which islands, considering the short time that has elapsed since the first landing of the settlers, have already become a very important as well as most convenient station for vessels to refresh at, coming round Cape Horn. If the granting such bar ren rocks, situate in such an inhospitable climate, amid eternal gales of wind, has been productive of so great a benefit to navigation, as well as so lucrative a fishery for fur-seals and black whales, how much more desirable is it to settle the great group of the Sandwich Islands, which in a few years might be made to produce all that the British West Indies now supply us with, in sugar, ginger, and turmeric, which are growing wild in every direction; cotton, cocoa, coffee, pepper, indigo, rum, molasses, arrow-root, &c. &c. of the finest quality, and in the greatest profusion, and all by means of free labour, either of the natives of the Sandwich Islands themselves, or of the Marquesas and the islands of New Zealand, whose inhabitants are a willing, hard-working people, and as soon as they might be required. from an increase of settlers, would be glad to remove under the kind treatment and protection of English masters."

Mr. James dilates upon the vast value of the harbour of Honoruru in Woahoo, discovered only a few years since, and "where there is water enough at low spring-tides for a frigate to enter with perfect safety; and within, a natural dock capable of containing 50 to 100 natural dock capable of containing square-rigged vessels, besides small craft, free from every danger. There is no other place from every danger. There is no other place where a ship can be hove down within 3000 miles. In addition to this fact, I have compiled a list of arrivals of shipping for one year in this port of Honoruru (the year 1830) exhibiting the names of 131 large vessels, amounting to 41,000 tons, entering the port either for the purposes of trade, refreshment, or repairs; an amount in this remote island that would do credit to many ports of Europe, averaging, as it does, 100 tons per day, and upwards. In this list you will observe that the large proportion of ships are American, and employed in the American fishery for spermaceti whales, which the English participate in only to a very trifling degree; the Americans being in the proportion of about five to one of English."

The Bonin Islands are "situate in 142° east longitude, and 27° north latitude, and within six days' sail of the harbour of Nangasaki in Japan, from which coast the junks and small craft would run over to Bonin, if they could purchase British goods there." They are "within a fortnight's sail of the Sandwich Islands, and close upon the coast of Japan. Their position on the chart was given to an English vessel by a Japanese vessel, and they turn out to be exceedingly valuable in their proximity to that rich and powerful people. The Bonin Islands were discovered perfectly uninhabited, covered with a valuable timber, in a fine climate, and within four or five days' sail of the Japanese territory; and there is no doubt, if ever the British manufactures can be introduced into that extensive empire, it will be through these Bonin Islands.

"The Sandwich group, though so large, yet, compared with the vast ocean they are surrounded with, are but specks, and being so and school four days out of the seven, and the litical measure by the government, or "they distant from any other land, enjoy a climate, fifth day is spent in compulsory labour for the might be granted in fee simple to a company of as it were, of their own; and hurricanes, earthquakes, and even gales of wind, are totally unknown. It never even thunders, or very rarely; and by going up a little higher in the interior, the happy inhabitants, when the present black generation are passed away (and they are fast going), may enjoy any climate they please, from the burning chocolate plains below, to the ice and snow of the arctic regions; no man ever having yet ascended to the top of Mona Roa, and most likely no man ever will be able, as it is 6000 feet higher than Mont Blanc. A three weeks' voyage takes you from any of the islands, which are all in sight of one another, to the rich coast of Mexico and California on the east; the same duration of voyage taking you to Canton and the coast of China, Manilla, and Japan, on the west; towards the north, three weeks take you to the numerous and valuable fur settlements of the Russians, at Sitka, Petrowpowlowski, and Norfolk Sound; while three weeks to the south carries you to Otaheite and the whole group of the pretty little Society Islands. Such a position is the happiest in the whole globe, and offers to an enterprising nation like the English advantages incalculable. Sandwich Islands may be considered also the very head quarters of the sperm fishery, which I presume to say is only in its infancy in this country, compared with what it will become when these fine islands shall be settled from England."

Such are the statements and the views of Mr. James, which we submit as we find them to the public consideration: and there is certainly much in what he says to be speculated upon, if we look into futurity for national objects.

Meanwhile, we are sorry to conclude with the portrait which he gives us of our old friend, Madame Boki.

" Madame Boki, as she has been nicknamed, may be seen in almost a state of nudity every day, in her straw hovel in Woahoo, beastly drunk; a quart or bottle of strong raw rum, in the course of the morning, being nothing to her. And this lady, the only one of the lot that has survived the visit to Europe, from her intemperate habits cannot be expected to live long. If then this woman, who, it must be admitted, is the highest person by birth, manners, dress, &c., among the native chiefs of all the islands, notwithstanding the good example which she has had of a better state of things, during her temporary residence in the Adelphi, is so bad and abandoned, what can be supposed of the others, who have not had such advantages? The demi-civilised chiefs of the islands, I have no hesitation in saying, are infinitely worse than any savages I have ever seen in all the Pacific Ocean; and it is mortifying to an Englishman's feelings, that he should not consider himself on his own soil, when he is treading those islands so dearly purchased by the blood of the greatest navigator that ever lived. The Russians attempted, some eight or ten years ago, to make a settlement in the Sandwich islands, seeing how convenient they would be to keep up a communication with their numerous and wealthy settlements on the N.W. coast of America; and a vessel of war, belonging to the czar, landed her guns in the port of Anaré, on the north side of the Island of Atooai, and built a very commanding fort, which still exists, though the settlement was soon abandoned, in consequence of a hint from the court of St. Petersburg, that it would be displeasing to Great Britain. The Americans also, though not fond of foreign dependencies, and not a colonising people, would be very glad if they could avail Sarjento Môr (upon whom he was billeted) themselves of such a central situation as those made a grand dinner, to which I was invited; islands offer, for the more easy carrying on being the only occasion upon which I ever was their increasing trade with China, and as a permanent resort to their hundreds of spermaceti whalers, but they also refrain from inter-fering with the prior rights of Great Britain; and so, what with the apathy of the English, the fear of giving offence on the part of the Russians, and the generous avowal of the Washington government, that they cannot set up any claim to the Sandwich Islands; those beautiful and invaluable places are rapidly going to ruin—at present prostrate at the feet of an ignorant and fanatical hierarchy of mechanic missionaries from America, who interfere with every thing concerning the trade and resources of the islands, as well as its internal government and connexion with vessels putting in for repairs and refreshment after foreign voyages, to the great loss and embarrassment of the owners and captains."

Santarem; or, Sketches of Society and Manners in the Interior of Portugal. 12mo. pp. 329. London, 1832. Fisher and Co.

WE wish the author had better proved his right to this title-page, for nothing could be more popular at this time than lively and accurate sketches from the interior of Portugal. But the volume gives us, instead, the move-ments of a medical officer in leaving home and serving (not much) during the Peninsular war, his adventures with English companions, the marches of English forces, accounts of their billets, &c. &c., none of which afford the slightest insight into Portuguese society and manners. Having thus disappointed us with a sketch of our own countrymen in Portugal when traversed by hostile armies, we shall not trouble ourselves much with the writer's conventional smartnesses, nor with his egregious egotism. There is a great deal of idle stuff, which it would be a sad waste of paper to enter upon - we will afford it only a few lines.

The preface tells us that this is an "unpretending volume, professing the mixed pretensions of amusement and instruction"-(we have met with neither): - at page 2 we are assured that " there cannot be too many even of bad books," which, were it for this one alone, we deny; and at page 3, we are asked, Where is the gold that came from Peru even so lately as the time of Columbus and his successors? Where is the silver that was carried triumphantly through the streets of London in waggons, as the reward of the daring enterprise of Anson and his followers? Have these been dissipated into gas, like so many cargoes of coal from Newcastle? Whither tends the current? Where is the magnet which attracts the mighty and unceasingly replenished mass? It leaves us, and we cannot trace it." If the author had read Jacob on the Precious Metals, he would not have printed such a rhapsody of nonsense.

But Fiat justitia (says the adage, and we have adopted it strictly as the motto of the Literary Gasette); we have selected almost the only picture of the Portuguese at home we could discover in these pages, as a favourable specimen of our rambling and incoherent author's style. He is at Santarem, apparently the extent of his travels from Lisbon! and "On the last day of the Intrudo, i.e. Shrove Tuesday, the day preceding that long fishseason, which certain holy persons are accustomed to designate as one of fasting, the invited to the table of a genuine Lusitanian. I am far from saying, or wishing to insinuate, that the people of Portugal do not dine, or that they are disinclined to hospitality; but convivial occasions are rare among, and even terrific to them. In the first place, they do not undertake such enterprises without greatly deranging the ordinary course of their eco-nomy. The dinner (for instance) of a good and respectable Portuguese family, is merely a muster for the purpose of satisfying hunger; and the muster is made more for the sake of convenience than of social enjoyment. The animal wants being provided for by eating, the palate is cooled by a quart-draught of fair water; after which all heads go to sleep. This is their idea of enjoying a dinner; and, of course, it will at once appear, that the habit of somnolency after repletion — a habit which people easily fall into, the more easily when hereditary, and adopted from the earliest period of life - is utterly fatal to the hilarity which an English dinner is designed and adapted to promote. To meals of this kind, therefore, strangers are seldom invited, and would feel but slight inducement to go. The table may be plentifully spread; but the cookery is coarse, and worse than coarse; while the garniture is any thing but elegant. Upon the occasion more particularly alluded to, the sargeant had mustered strong indeed. The company consisted of his senhora - a brother, who came in an ecclesiastical garb, and who was introduced to me as a beneficiado of some establishment ruined by the French, and the reader's very obedient servant - a partie carrée. Whether a larger muster might not have been made upon some other more ex-clusive family occasion, I know not; but upon the eve of Ash Wednesday it was a sort of duty (albeit toilsome and laborious) for every family to eat up their own provender. It would have been utterly at variance with all practice and notions to have fed animals on through forty days to no purpose; and there-fore this was a fatal hour for bipeds and quadrupeds, whether of the feather or the fur. We began the solemn business of the occasion with an ocean of cabbage, beans, oil, bacalhao,* beef, bacon, pumpkins, tomatas, and water, boiled together, and presented in a tureen. This I understood was soup. What order the sequences came forth in, I do not recollect; but I have a confused remembrance of lumps of something swimming in oil, and strengthened with fluid salt butter. I think there was a leash of coelhos; † and there was a hopeful kid (like the negro's pig, tam ittle, mut tam ole) baked entire. All this would not be worth relating, but for the circumstances, which astounded me not a little, of every dish being cleared as it was produced. Three people, for I declare I could not perform my part of the play, devoured the olda podrida, the lumps, the rabbits, and the kid, with amazing despatch. In the mean time there was no want of wine from the worthy sarjenta's quinta, or farm, in the neighbourhood; which, having been brought in the skins of the pigs whose bones, and ribs, and flesh, and features, had been required to enrich the pot-au-feu, tasted like a decoction of rhubarb. Well, we are not done yet - after all this came water-melons, as big as Chinese lanterns, and almost as void, excepting of the saccharine liquor for which they are remarkable, and oranges by the bushel, with insipid and thick grapes by the crop. Every thing was entombed; and, to my definitive confusion, (who had by this time, by dint and force of example, begun to feel symptoms of surfeit, though good manners forbade me to mention it,) there came a huge coarse brown dish of some luscious composition, resembling in its external aspect our peas-pudding, of which one spoonful was all I could discuss; and which was despatched with as much avidity as if the company had eaten nothing since that day twelvemonth. To close and crown all, the cooling draught of the element was not omitted, and, being presented in a tall clear glass, it was not difficult to ascertain that it contained no full-grown horseborders of the high-ways. The only resource in such a serious case was (by natural pro-pensities and established habits) denied to me, viz. sleep. I suffered while they snored."

The Portuguese ideas of the English and their warlike means, if not exaggerated in the instance recorded, are amusing.

" It chanced, on some occasion, that our discourse fell upon national merit and distinctions. He (the sergeant) observed with great force, and considerable appearance of truth, that the English were a well-meaning people, and great favourites with the Portuguese nation; as a proof of which, these gave them their strong wines to drink, and the courage thereby inspired had certainly made them very useful in helping to drive the French out of the country. 'Help! help! sir?' said I, taken rather by surprise. 'Yes, yes,' said he; 'they certainly did help: they behaved very well when the enemy passed through this town-for they followed our cacadores (light infantry) with great alacrity; and when they came up with the French, stood their ground with considerable bravery. 'Why,' said I, 'I have been sadly misinformed; for I always understood that the Portuguese regiments accompanied the English, and did tolerably well under British officers.' 'Oh, no! quite the contrary, I assure you; the English army is commanded by Portuguese officers.' 'Indeed! and pray who commands the Portuguese army? Is it not Marshal Beresford?' 'I believe so; but, you know, he is an Irishman, and consequently a Christian-(Is he? thinks I to myself)-and he never saw any service till he came into our country.' It was absurd to take offence with a gentleman of this stamp; so I gave up the claims of the army, as not likely to be established by any arguments of mine, and turned his attention to the other strong arm of old England. 'Well, senhor, I cannot possibly pretend to know so much about Portugal as will allow that they have done their work; for they have not left an enemy to fight with. 'Your navy! excellent! the best sailors in the world_the very bravest_and the finest ships. How lucky that they are commanded by Portuguese!' Such are specimens of 'the march intellectual' in its then stage among the respectable natives of this happy and enlightened country; but when I speak of natives, I mean those who never had occasion to go beyond view of their native orange-trees. Travelled Portuguese are quite upon a par with the subjects of any other government; and even among those who (to use their own expression) 'have never been abroad,' I have met with instances of extensive and unusual acquirements."

The following are among the sergeant's conor four wives? Are there any bullocks in England? Does not the government lock all the people up upon Sunday, except when they are allowed to go to the theatre? Is it not considered indispensably polite to kiss the women whenever you meet them? Are not the English generally drunk? Is it true that the fidalgos (nobles) ride upon men's backs? Have you any horses in your country?-any asses? Did you ever see bacalhao alive? Is not mustard made of the same sort of stuff as butter? Is not honey made in the East Indies? Is it not always foggy in England?'-and so on ad infinitum. I found the mustard manuleeches, the never-failing inhabitants of those factory to be an object of great general interest classical stone fountains which decorate the and curiosity; for I once had the honour of factory to be an object of great general interest accompanying a family to tea with the nuns in the parlour of the convent of Santa Clara; and these intelligent damsels questioned, and crossquestioned, and re-questioned me about this mustard of ours, till they had extracted every particle of my knowledge on the subject; after all which they were by no means satisfied, but begged to have the pleasure of seeing me again for that they were sure that the Donna Abadessa, or whatever was her proper style and dignity, would like to have some conversation with me about mustard."

> American Ornithology. By A. Wilson and C. L. Buonaparte. With illustrative Notes and a Life of Wilson, by Sir W. Jardine, Bart. 3 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. Whittaker and Co.

THE publication of Wilson's American Ornithology forms an era in the history of natural science. We have hardly an instance where a humble and obscure individual has completed an undertaking of such magnitude, unaided by fortune or patronage; for the work seemed to require very great resources, in persevering under difficulties and discouragements which might have quelled the energies of the most powerful, and conquered the spirit of the most enthusiastic. Verily Scotland may be proud of such a son: well may she boast of her system of education, when we find it fostering an ardent love of simple nature amid all the smoke and bustle of a manufacturing town, and teaching the loveliness of creation among the creak of wheels and the noise of machinery. Perhaps no other country could have produced a man who went, almost at a step, from the workshop to the forest, and who, though inured to the city, found himself at home in the woods. It must at once strike every one that Wilson was no ordinary person; and his history and his writings equally combine to prove that the development of his character was chiefly owing to the system you do, and I am not myself a combatant; but of national instruction which has raised the what do you think of the British navy? You Scots so high among their neighbours. Withment of his might; but the plain practical principle, afforded by Scotland to her children, sent him into the world prepared for every out where he perished," as he himself expresses his hope of eternising his name, seems to have youth; but we are not told by what fortunate incident he was led to identify his fame with an ardent lover of nature, the birds of America, objects of peculiar attraction; and as he was in sensibly led on from observation to observation he probably found himself a naturalist withou marking the steps of his progress. Perhap there never was an author—there certainly has not been in the same branch of literatur -whose work bears the impress of his per sonal character more strongly than Wilson's He was not only an acute, but a feeling observer: he appears actually to have entereinto the objects of his remarks, to have share in their pleasures and their pains, to have ex perienced all their sensations. It is for thi reason that, after perusing his descriptions, w feel not merely that we could at once recognis the birds from them, but we can scarcely dives ourselves of the belief that we have actuall beheld them. Often as the mocking-bird ha been painted, we never have had the curiou warbler so completely brought before us as i the following passage.

"The plumage of the mocking-bird, though none of the homeliest, has nothing gaudy o brilliant in it, and, had he nothing else t recommend him, would scarcely entitle him t notice; but his figure is well proportioned, an even handsome. The ease, elegance, and ra pidity of his movements, the animation of hi eye, and the intelligence he displays in listening and laying up lessons from almost every specie of the feathered creation within his hearing are really surprising, and mark the peculiarit of his genius. To these qualities we may adthat of a voice full, strong, and musical, an capable of almost every modulation, from th clear mellow tones of the wood thrush to th savage scream of the bald eagle. In measur and accent he faithfully follows his originals in force and sweetness of expression he greatl improves upon them. In his native groves mounted on the top of a tall bush or half-grown tree, in the dawn of dewy morning, while th woods are already vocal with a multitude o warblers, his admirable song rises pre-eminen over every competitor. The ear can listen this music alone, to which that of all other seems a mere accompaniment. Neither is thi strain altogether imitative: his own nativ notes, which are easily distinguishable by sucl as are well acquainted with those of our variou song-birds, are bold and full, and varied seem ingly beyond all limits. They consist of shor expressions of two, three, or, at the most, fiv or six syllables, generally interspersed with imitations, and all of them uttered with grea emphasis and rapidity, and continued with un diminished ardour for half an hour or an hou at a time. His expanded wings and tail, glis tening with white, and the buoyant gaiety o his action, arresting the eye as his song mos irresistibly does the ear, he sweeps round witl out any education, his powers would have remained unknown even to himself; a system of forced and artificial instruction would have destroyed the simplicity which is the chief elean arrow, as if to recover or recall his very soul teaching, strengthened by moral and religious expired in the last elevated strain.' While thu exerting himself, a person destitute of sigh would suppose that the whole feathered tribe change, and armed against every chance. The dad assembled together on a trial of skill, each desire of leaving behind some "beacon to point striving to produce his utmost effect—so perfec are his imitations. The mocking-bird loses little of the power and energy of his song by confinement. In his domesticated state, when he commences his career of song, it is impossible to stand by un-interested. He whistles for the dog — Cassar starts up, wage his tail, and runs to meet his master: he squeaks out like a hurt chicken and the hen hurries about with hanging wings and bristling feathers, clucking to protect its injured brood. The barking of the dog, the mewing of the cat, the creaking of a passing wheelbarrow, follow with great truth and rapidity. He repeats the tune taught him by his master, though of considerable length, fully and faithfully: he runs over the quivering of the canary and the clear whistlings of the Virginia nightingale, or red bird, with such superior execution and effect, that the mortified songsters feel their own inferiority, and become altogether silent, while he seems to triumph in their defeat by redoubling his exertions."

To the present edition is subjoined the continuation of Wilson's work, by Charles Lucien Buonaparte, who shared no small portion of his enthusiasm, and fully equalled him in ability. The valuable Notes and the interesting Life of Wilson are from the pen of Sir William Jar-dine, a naturalist of congenial mind both in feeling and talent. The plates are better executed than those in the American edition, and the greatest possible attention has been paid to accuracy of colouring. Altogether, we have rarely seen a more valuable work on natural history, and not one more entertaining.

We are glad to embrace this opportunity of expressing the delight we experience at observing the great change that has lately taken place in works on natural science-we mean the substitution of lively descriptions for dry technicalities and unintelligible nomenclature. The rage for system and classification was fast encumbering natural history with a load of terminology, which would have ended by becoming a language in extent, and a jargon in difficulty. But the evil has been checked before it grew intolerable; and the work before us is an example of accurate information, which the most learned naturalist may peruse with profit, and the uninitiated general reader with pleasure. We hope that its circulation will have the effect of directing the attention of many to our own ornithology: Wilson has shewn the true mode of observing nature-may our countrymen profit by the pattern!

Analysis of the Currency Question, and History of the Origin and Growth of Joint Stock Banking in England. By T. Joplin. London, 1832. Ridgway.

Ir this work does not contain the best and clearest explanation of our difficulties, it certainly touches very closely, if not indisputably, upon the right clue. He contends for the advantage, or rather the necessity, of letting paper currency and banking accounts perform the functions of money, unimpeded by monopoly, or by any legislative interference; at least his statements lead to this conclusion. We recommend his Analysis to general perusal, because we think it yields instruction, not only where he reasons correctly, but more so where his arguments may be considered to be specious by those who hold opposite doctrines.

A great step is made towards the removal of popular error by inducing the public to inquire into the principles upon which their opinions are founded. This is most easily accomplished by starting a paradox, and shewing that it is our author assumes, p. 104, that the income of society is annually spent. This is contrary to the general belief, that societies, like individuals, advance in wealth by living within their incomes, and not spending the whole of them; but the principle that prices are regulated by the quantity of money is no less generally received, and upon it Mr. Joplin has erected his paradox. He had previously stated, that the real income of society consists in commodities, and that these must be annually spent, or no annual income can be derived from them; that the income of society consists of the income of individuals, and every man must do one of three things with his income. must spend and consume it, he must lend it to others who will do so, or he must hoard it: but to hoard, is to contract the currency. This does not prevent the consumption, it only cheapens commodities generally, until the money left in circulation will purchase the whole of them. In this manner the writer argues that the income produced cannot exceed the income spent, and, consequently, the income of society is annually spent.

Admitting that income depends entirely on consumption, it follows, that if only eighty millions are spent in the consumption of commodities raised to pay an income of a hundred millions, the price of the commodities must undergo a reduction of one-fifth, because the whole amount does not exceed eighty millions. The fall of prices occasioned by individuals is attributed to a contraction of the currency, because the contraction and fall are theoretically and inseparably connected in the author's mind; but it is questionable whether a contraction of the currency must ensue from the assigned cause, although a much greater one than is here supposed may arise from it. have seen by what happened in the year 1825, that it is in the power of those who do not spend their incomes to lock up the whole of our gold coin, which is not estimated higher than thirty, and cannot exceed forty millions, and to throw a mass of our paper currency out of circulation. But this insecurity of our banking system is occasioned entirely by making gold the sole legal tender. According to the statement before us, what one man saves another must lose, and society cannot advance in wealth. This is in a great degree rendered true at present by Lord Liverpool's measures, which have confined trade as nearly as possible to the supply of immediate wants, and rendered it dangerous to make use of credit in the various modes of employing surplus produce, which it is the province of speculation to find out.

It cannot be necessary that the whole income of society should be annually spent; on the contrary, the surplus commodities, in which surplus income consists, may be employed as capital; and this has been represented by Adam Smith and other writers as the manner in which capital is created: but it is very clear that unless surplus income is employed as capital, the parsimony of one man must work the ruin of another, unless it is counterbalanced by the extravagance of a third; and in many instances rent and interest must be paid out of the pockets of farmers and tradesmen, instead of out of the profits of agriculture and commerce. Every one endeavours to fling the burden from his own shoulders, but it must light somewhere. To public functionaries, and all persons of fixed incomes, the fall of prices is clear gain; therefore they endeavour to find means of accounting for it that shall draw off attention from the true cause; their exemption founded on commonly received principles. Thus from the defalcation makes it fall the heavier butes the suspension and subsequent high price upon the owners of land and houses, as well as upon trade and industry.

It is the business of paper currency to convert income into capital, and not surplus income alone; it makes one kind of annual income serve as capital for the production of another. Agricultural produce, before it reaches the landlord in the payment of rent, serves as capital for the production of manufactures, when it can be purchased with bank notes. The smallnote currency increased the consumption of agricultural produce, by enabling it to supply the manufacturer with capital; more bread and meat being consumed by the labourer when he is employed at hard work, with high wages, than when he is subsisting upon parish allowance. The suppression of the small-note currency operates like a tax upon the payment of wages. A banker in the west of England, who used to charge no interest upon his notes against a bill on London at two or three months, now charges one-third per cent for payment in gold, besides the full interest at the highest rate the law allows. Adam Smith asserted, that when a man borrows for the purposes of trade, it is not money, but the goods obtained with the money, that he really borrows. There is greater truth in this, when instead of coin he borrows paper currency. The seller, who accepts bank notes in payment of his goods, lends their value, and lets them become capital, if they were not so previously. Paper currency increases the quantity of capital, by making commodities become capital, which could not be used for that purpose without its assistance. It creates the trade by which it is employed.

The increase of capital by paper circulation has never been properly contemplated by any theorist; even the author before us, the strenuous advocate of the banking system, who has devoted his whole attention to it, and has probably perused every well-known work upon the subject, cannot get beyond the maxim of Adam Smith, that the sole advantage of banks consists in securing a steady amount of paper equal to the amount of the metallic money which would have been in circulation if there had been no paper.

Banks increase consumption by creating capital out of income, not by adding to the amount of the currency, for the same effect may be produced if the use of currency were superseded by the truck system, and by transfers of banking accounts, which might be applied to the smallest transactions, even to the weekly consumption of the labourer by village savings' banks. The place of the small notes is not fully supplied by sovereigns, because the latter are more liable to be hoarded, and because bankers cannot issue them as freely and upon the same liberal terms.

Deposit banks, similar to the savings' banks, but on a more extended scale, would be one good means of converting income into capital. They might increase consumption, while they contracted the currency, and this would prove that prices are not so much regulated by the amount of currency.

A capital equal to that of the Bank of England has already accumulated out of minor savings, and might have been doubled if the deposits at the savings' banks had been allowed to extend to larger sums. This shews the benefit that may be produced by abolishing the Bank monopoly, and introducing the Scotch banking system in the metropolis.

Our analyst supposes the affairs of the Bank of England have been mismanaged, and attriof bullion to mismanagement. One of his pro- guessed, with a cold chisel; and were finished posals is to take the circulation of the Bank of England out of its hands. Our own opinions upon this subject, and of our circulation in general, are upon record in the Literary Gaxette, where, in a series of papers (afterwards printed and widely circulated in the form of a pamphlet), we endeavoured to demonstrate, that a sterling paper currency, secured to ten times its amount, might be issued by the government of the country, all the profits of the coinage thereof be made public revenue, our capital immensely increased, and the country effectually guarded against every chance of fluctuation or panic. Convinced of the practicability of this plan, and being ready to prove it in every working of the minutest detail, it is indeed with regret we see the Bank inquiry, like the former bullion question, pursued to perplex the public mind with vain theories, and diverted from the real point at issue by extraneous speculations mixing up with it every possible source of confusion and future mischief.

Compaigns and Cruises in Venezuela, &c. [Second notice: conclusion.]

In looking back to our postponed articles, we find among the rest the end of our review of this entertaining work; and as the passages marked for selection are interesting, even in an insulated form, we shall now (late as it is) add a few of them, as much to give variety to this week's sheet as to do justice to the publication itself.

South American Coinage .- " Paëz established amint at Achaguas for the use of the army. This new establishment, for the simplicity of its machinery, and economy observed in the number of officers employed, was, perhaps, unrivalled in any country. In a room in the Plaza, where some of the English were quartered, a block of wood was fixed in the brick floor, and a small anvil was driven into the top of it, having a die engraved on it, representing one side of a pezéta, or quarter-dollar. The stamp, for the reverse of this coin, was on a short piece of steel, secured in a handle of iron, for the convenience of striking it with a sledgehammer, when placed on a piece of metal of the proper size and weight, which was laid on the under die, or anvil. The shape of this coin was totally disregarded; nor was the master of the mint much more particular about the weight of each separate piece. This, certainly, was of very little consequence, when it is considered of what metal this money, purporting to be silver, was coined. Paëz had collected, for this purpose, a considerable quantity of old silver, of different kinds, such as stirrups, sword-scabbards, and various other ornaments taken from the enemy by his troops, who were exceedingly expert in plundering: he had also bought up private and church plate to a large amount. All this was melted down, with one fourth of copper; which mixture, together with the previous alloy contained in the silver, formed, it must be allowed, a base metal worthy of such a mint. The only officers employed in the coinage were a smith of all work, who had been used to make and repair coarse articles in silver, and his son, a lad of about fifteen years old. There was no mystery practised with respect to the adulteration of the current coin; the doors being left open, without even a sentry on them. The process was simply this : - After having run the metal into narrow bars, these were heated red hot for stamping, by roughly filing off the corners of each piece, so as to leave a kind of polygon, resembling what is called in the West Indies cut-money. This coin, though undoubtedly a base currency, was of the most essential service to the army and the neighbouring country, as there was previously a great want of a circulating medium. It readily passed current for the full value assigned it; because Paëz, whose word was confided in by the inhabitants of his province, had promised to call it all in, when he should be enabled to do so by a more flourishing state of affairs. This promise was punctually performed about a year after; when Bolívar brought up sterling money from Guayana sufficient to call in all the depreciated coinage."

The Wild Horses .- "The herds of wild horses present a beautiful spectacle when they are alarmed in their native wilds by the intrusion of an army. Instead of flying, as the deer and other timid animals, they gallop round in compact masses of many thousands, apparently for the purpose of reconnoitering the strangers; and frequently advance boldly to within a few yards of the line of march, where they halt to gaze at the troops, snorting, and shewing every sign of astonishment and displeasure, especially at sight of the cavalry. These droves are always headed by some finelooking old bashaws, whose flowing manes and tails plainly shew that they have never been subject to man's control; and in the rear the mares and colts follow."

Curious Breed of Horses .-- " There is a singular-looking breed of horses found among these mountains, very diminutive in size; not neatly formed like ponies, but rather resembling cart horses in miniature. They have large shaggy manes, very rough coats, and thick fetlocks covered with long hair. They are never shod, nor are their hoofs ever pared; so that the horny part projects forward, in some instances, to nearly a foot in length. This gives the animal a most awkward appearance, and suggests the idea of people walking with snow-shoes; yet, notwithstanding this apparent encumbrance, they are very surefooted little animals, and considered equal to mules on bad rocky roads."

Hospitality at the Farms .- " On arriving at one of these farms, no ceremony whatever is used, except the usual salutation of ' Ave Maria purisima!' The travellers' horses are immediately unsaddled, and turned loose; for it is quite a matter of indifference whether they stray or not, as there are always plenty of horses close at hand, which are considered completely public property. Water is then brought to wash the strangers' feet; after which every one spreads his cloak or blanket in the shade, and lies down, using his saddle for a pillow. Meanwhile, one of the family has already saddled a horse, and set out in search of a calf, or young heifer, for which they have seldom far to ride: indeed, they generally keep one tied up in the corral, in readiness for their daily use, as meat will not keep here until the next day after being killed. In less than half an hour, an abundance of roast beef is set before the visitors; and sometimes, but very rarely in the remote haciendas, some arepa. Salt is usually very scarce, (it was at this time worth twelve dollars a pound); and, when it is to be procured, is melted in water, and presented in a calabash, into which each morsel of meat is cheese, and generally aguardiente. Although these people, secluded as they are from society, must naturally be very desirous of hearing news of any kind, their innate sense of politeness forbids them to annoy their guests by asking questions until they have satisfied their appetite. They retire to rest soon after sunset; and, previous to lying down, the patriarch of the family, who has probably scores of young descendants on the farm, working in company with, and in no way distinguished from, the peons, recites the Rosario, or evening service to the Virgin; every one present standing, and joining in the responses.

Singular Fish...." Many of the men were severely bit in their legs and thighs by a small fish, called the carribi. These are never more than three or four inches in length, and are shaped like a gold-fish, which they also resemble in the brilliant orange hue of their scales. Although they are so small, their exceeding voraciousness, and the incalculable numbers in which they swarm, render them very dangerous. They are, indeed, to the full as much dreaded, if not more so, by a Llanéro than the Their mouth is very large in procavman. portion to their size, and opens much in the same manner as a bullet-mould. It is furnished with broad and sharp teeth, like those of a shark in miniature; so that wherever they bite, they take away the piece of flesh. When once either man or beast is attacked by them, they will strip the limb of flesh in a surprisingly short time; for the taste of the blood spreading in the water collects them by myriads."

Romantic History .- " Among those who were put to death during this period of terror, the Colombians will long remember the unfor-tunate Doña Apolinaria Zalabarriata, better known by the name of La Pola, who was sentenced to death by Zamano, and shot, together with her betrothed husband. She was a young lady of good family in Bogota, and was distinguished by her beauty and accomplishments. Enthusiastically attached to the cause of liberty, she devoted herself to the hazardous task of obtaining and transmitting to Bolivar secret intelligence respecting the force, disposition, and plans of operation, of the royalist army. The particulars of this important information she contrived to collect from the Spanish officers themselves, at the tertúlias, or evening conversaziones at her house, which were frequented by many of them, who listened with delight to her powers of conversation and singing, accompanied by her guitar. From these officers, who could not possibly suspect so young, and apparently artless, a female of any dangerous design, she used to inquire, as if merely in the course of conversation, about their respective regiments; and, by asking after their absent companions, she found means of learning where their advanced posts were stationed. She regularly transmitted all the information she could collect to Bolívar, by means of a trusty messenger; but, unfortunately, one of her packets was intercepted, and the messenger, under the terror of impending death, was compelled to betray her. She was immediately tried by a military court (martial law having been proclaimed in the capital), and was condemned to be shot, together with her lover; although no proofs whatever could be produced of his having been privy to her undertaking. They were placed in capilla for twelve hours, previous to being brought out for execution; but even this short interval in a common forge, and hammered out to the dipped. By this management, a small quanfor execution; but even this short interval proper thickness. The blanks were then cut, as nearly of the proper weight as could be substance. The repast concludes with milk, considered it of the greatest importance to discover, if possible, who were her accomplices. To effect this, no means were left untried to induce her to betray them. She was on the one hand threatened by the friar who was sent to confess her, with eternal punishment hereafter, if she should dare to conceal any thing from him; and on the other, attempted to be bribed by offers of pardon and rewards for herself and her betrothed, if she would declare by whom she had been assisted. She, however, resolutely denied having any accomplice except the messenger whom she had employed. The lovers were both led out the next day, and bound close to each other, on two banquillos, surrounded by troops. When the picket of grenadiers appointed to shoot them was marched up close, and in readiness, she was once more offered pardon on the former conditions. She again, without evincing any signs of fear, declared that if she had any accomplices she would scorn to betray them for the purpose of saving her own life; but that, as Bolivar was fast approaching, they would be known on his arrival. Having observed that her intended husband was hesitating, as if about to speak, through a very natural dread of the death he saw so near, she implored him, as her last request, if he had ever really loved her, to shew by his death that he was worthy of her choice; assuring him that the tyrant Zamano would never spare his life, whatever disclosures he might make; and reminding him, that he ought to derive consolation from the reflection that his death was shared by her he loved. The friars then retired, and the firing party made ready. She then, for the first time, felt dread, and exclaimed, 'Conque, verdugos, teneis valor de maiar una muger!—You have, then, the heart, butchers, to kill a woman!' She immediately covered her face with her saya; and on drawing it aside for that purpose, the words 'Viva la Patria!' were discovered embroidered in gold on the basquina. The signal was then given from the viceroy's balcony, and they were both instantly shot."

Our Village. By Miss Mitford. 12mo. pp. 362. Vol. V. London, 1832. Whittaker and Co. WE have only time, this week, to notice the ifth and concluding volume of this gallery of rustic scenes and familiar life, which shews the family lineaments strong in its resemblance to its predecessors. The sketches are twenty-four in number, and all bear the impress of Miss Mitford's natural and graphic pencil.

History, Description, and Survey of the Cities of London and Westminster, the Borough of Southwark, and parts adjacent thereto. Parts III and IV. E. Wilson.

This is a cheap but useful publication. "If," say the proprietors of it, "it is needful for us to be familiar with the principal events connected with our country, how much more ought we to study to become conversant not only with the rise and progressive improvement, but also with the laws, customs, privileges, and immunities of the city in which we more immediately reside?" Such a familiarity this work seems well calculated to impart.

Counsels to the Young. By John Morison, D.D. author of "Counsels to the Newly-wedded Pair," &c. Pp. 110. London, 1832. Westley and Davis.

A VERY tiny but a very excellent production,

Dr. Morison is of the Scots church; and both for learning and usefulness an ornament to the ministry to which he belongs.

Venice: a Poem. Romanus and Emilia: a Dramatic Sketch. Pp. 51. Wisbeach, W. Watts: London, Whittaker.

THE didactic poem is better written than the dramatic sketch, and shews that the latter, in all its degrees, requires a different talent.

A Few Facts for the Consideration of those interested in the Affairs of Portugal. By T. Green. London, 1832.

In this pamphlet of twenty-seven pages Mr. Green, who is a Miguelite, gives a curious exposé of the way in which English recruits have been crimped for the service of Don Pedro. under the pretence of emigration, protected by a colonial company; thus endeavouring to avoid the penalties of the foreign enlistment act.

Passion and Reason; or, the modern Quintilian Brothers: a Novel. 4 vols. By E. Cullen Brown, author of the "Sisters of St. Gothard." London, 1832. Hey.

A NOVEL of the old school, in four volumes, if it does not demand either critical examination or opinion, furnishes, at least, valid grounds for recommending its author to the kindness and benevolent feelings of the humane who may not have had an opportunity of subscribing to the publication. Miss Brown is the daugh. ter of the celebrated Dr. Brown, and diffidently puts forward her literary claim to awaken the sympathies of those who are prone to mitigate misfortune and relieve distress.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PHENOMENON IN NATURAL HISTORY.

THE following interesting fact in natural history was communicated by Dr. Weatherhead to the committee of science of the Zoological Society, at their meeting on Tuesday last.

For the last five-and-twenty years naturalists in Europe have been striving to obtain the carcass of the impregnated female Ornithorhynchus paradoxus, for the purpose of ascertaining its mode of gestation, but without success; for it is by dissection alone that the hitherto doubtful and disputed point concerning the anomalous and paradoxical manner of bringing forth and rearing its young can be satisfactorily demonstrated. This long-sought-for desideratum is at length attained. Through the kindness of his friend, Lieutenant the Honourable Lauderdale Maule, of the 39th regiment, Dr. Weatherhead has had the bodies of several ornithorhynchi transmitted to him from New Holland, in one of which the ova are preserved; establishing, along with other curious circumstances ascertained, the extraordinary fact, that this animal, which combines the bird and quadruped together in its outward form, lays eggs and hatches them like the one, and rears and suckles them like the other.

AGRICULTURAL EMPLOYMENT INSTITUTION.

This Institution is beginning to proclaim its purposes and bestir itself. An elevated and respectable list of vice-presidents and directors has been published, together with a clear statement of the objects they have in view, and the means by which they hope to accomplish them. and, like all that have emanated from the pen of Several of these individuals have already tried Dr. Morison, eminently calculated to enforce the experiment they recommend, and their sucreligious principles and inspire Christian piety. cess on a smaller scale not only proves its practicability and benefit, but holds out an admirable example to others to unite with them in this more general and extended enterprise. There are fifteen millions of acres of waste and uncultivated land in the United Kingdom, capable of being made profitably to supply the fruits of the earth and sustenance for the starving poor; and there are tens and tens of thousands of such, able and willing to work, destitute of employment, and debased by parish charity; entailing on the country an amount of Rate frightful to contemplate, and shame-fully misapplied. Here then is the broad and simple case before us. We are not visionaries enough to hold this scheme up as a panacea for all our evils; nor are we inclined (which we think is the only unwise part of the Society's advertisement) to depreciate other modes of relieving the prevailing distress; but we say, that, as far as it can be carried into effect, it is good, and if well-managed, it must be attended by the best political and moral consequences. The cost of transporting, or otherwise punishing one criminal, would establish three industrious families in their cheerful cottages, with their allotments of land to cultivate. Make the poor man thus, as it were, a proprietor of the soil, give him also his stake in the national hedge, and see what he will be. Industrious, contented, independent in spirit, remunerated for his labours, and distinguished and rewarded for any superior activity, or other good qualities he may display; you have the valuable and productive denizen, instead of the reckless depredator and consuming pauper. But beyond this, you have the pattern to others, the living instances close to them in their own sphere, to teach the idle and dissipated that happiness is the result of honest diligence, while want and misery are the inevitable and bitterly felt results of their own unsettled and precarious habits. And farther still, the former class becomes a check upon the latter; the best of checks, not of law, and coercion, and severity, of degradation and imprisonment at vast expense, but of salutary mutual observation, of that which comes home to the business and bosom of every rational being, even in the lowest state of ignorance, and exposed to the worst temptations of evil. A single neighbour in a village prospering through virtuous conduct, is worth more than the church can inculcate by persuasion, or the legislature enforce by terror.

Let us indulge in the expectation, therefore, that this Institution may become useful far and wide; that it may find the means of acting upon an extensive scale throughout the country; and that, through energy and judgment in those to whom the important charge is entrusted, it may very soon indeed

THE EXPECTED COMET.

THE comet of Biela is approaching the earth's orbit with increasing velocity, and towards the end of the following month it will partially intersect the course which the earth traverses in its journey round the sun. Happily, the comet will be in advance of the earth, so that unless our globe augments its pace, or the anticipated visitant retards its journey, there will be no risk of any dangerous proximity, much less of a hostile collision. During this return, at least, it will always be more than two hundred times the moon's distance from us; and were it, at any future time, to approach very much nearer than the orbit of our satellite, its influence would be too inconsiderable to affect any of the elements of the earth's path.

and of that class termed nebulous, having no the preceding torrents. where the comet's centre crosses the plane of the ecliptic is within and very near the curve which the earth describes, - so very near, that the outskirts of the nebulous matter of the comet might possibly, at some future visit, envelop our planet, and would thus enclose the earth, it is not unlikely, at its ensuing return, if it were about a month later than the time calculated, of its intersecting the plane of the earth's motion.

The presence of the moon the ensuing week will interfere with telescopic observations, or probably the comet might be detected as a small round nebulosity, moving midway between the northern horn of Taurus and the bright star Capella, towards Gemini. There are nebulæ near its course for which it must not be mistaken.

Deptford.

J. T. BARKER.

MOUNT VESUVIUS.

Naples, 10th August.

EVER since the latter end of July the mountain has been again extremely agitated; so that if we consider the continued projection of volcanic substances to a considerable height, the great torrents of lava which flow at the same time from two opposite sides of the cone, with the violent convulsion and explosion like thunder-this eruption, which still continues, appears to be the greatest that we have had for several years. On the night of the 23d of July, a small crater was formed in the interior of the large one, and an emission of fluid volcanic substances ensued, which were projected upwards. Till the 29th of July the mountain did not cease to emit flames and throw up stones, accompanied by shocks from time to time. On the evening of that day the eruptions became more violent, and were suspended only for an interval of three minutes, while detonations were heard over the whole neighbourhood. In five days the crater was filled to the height of 250 feet, and thirteen different but inconsiderable streams of lava issued from the interior. Two took the direction of Torre del Greco, flowing in the beds of old torrents of lava; others were lost meandering on the declivity of the cone, others scarcely passed the edge of it in the direction of Boscotrecase. Since the 30th of July a new stream of lava has been flowing from the crater towards Boscotrecase, over that which eight months ago took the same direc-To all appearance it would stop at the place called Fosso di Fichi. Another stream of lava issued from the old crater on the 31st of July, in the direction of the Hermitage del Salvatore. These two advanced very slowly, and came only half way down the cone. In the interior of the old crater many fissures are now observed, from thirty to forty feet in breadth. Three ponds, too, of lava, if the term may be allowed, have been formed there, each of them about 150 feet in circumference. The explosions and the thundering noise continued, as on the preceding days. Early the evening before yesterday (8th August), a vast torrent of lava appeared on this side, flowing from the crater towards the Hermitage, and at the same place as the lava-stream in January last. When it was first seen, this torrent occupied the whole height of the cone from the top to the bottom,

FINE ARTS.

THE RAST INDIES.

WHILE our contemporaries of the political press are wading through the Bank Committee Report, and enlightening their readers on Economy and Finance, it may not be unbecoming in us to direct some attention to the evidence taken before the committee on the affairs of the East India Company, in so far as it is connected with literature and the arts. Our readers are already aware that the minutes of such committees are held to be private papers, and that much inconveniency has sometimes arisen from their being made public; but we are sure, when the nature and drift of our use of those before us are seen, it will be felt that no afforded, except, we flatter ourselves, the general interests of civilisation and refinement, which it has ever been the object of the Literary Gazette to promote.

On the 19th of July the committee examined the Rev. James Gough, a chaplain of much intelligence and experience in the south of the Carnatic; John Walter Sherer, Esq. accountant-general in Bengal; and Sir Alexander Johnston, chief justice and president of H. M. council in Ceylon. The evidence of the first, touching the Romish and Protestant churches in India, the number of converts, the state and effects of instruction and religion, &c. &c. is very interesting; but we turn to the last, as presenting new and original ideas on points more intimately connected with our sphere of action, and the character of our journal. The Hindoo governments have in all ages, and in every part of India, endeavoured to give stability and popularity to their system of government, by circulating amongst their subjects, through the medium of dramatic, pictorial, and sculptural representations, such moral and political opinions as would lead them to coincide with, and take an interest in, all the different institutions established by and connected with the existing government. All those political and moral sentiments which at present generally prevail amongst the Hindoo natives of India, are such as lead them to respect and sympathise with the Hindoo system of government, and those institutions which it is the policy, and ought to be the endeavour of the British government gradually to alter, they being adverse to the more liberal and enlightened moral and political feelings which it has become necessary, in consequence of the change of government which the British conquests in India have brought about, to circulate amongst the people of the country. Sir Alexander Johnston therefore proposes, in his evidence, to employ, according to the ancient customs of India, dramatic, sculptural, and pictorial representations, executed by the ablest authors and artists in this country, as the most efficient means of rendering intelligible and popular amongst the natives the system of government and institutions which the British legislature may think proper to substitute for the former Hindoo system of government and Hindoo institutions. The measure proposed by Sir Alexander is most desirable, because it is the most rapid way of circulating amongst the natives such moral and political opinions as may lead to the improvement of their under-

This comet is about 40,000 miles in diameter, | considerable, and much broader than any of | India the finest models of composition which can be produced by the most enlightened authors in this country, and the finest specimens for their imitation of the arts of painting and sculpture; and, finally, because it will be the means of opening to the greatest geniuses and the first artists in England, one of the most important fields for a display of their respective talents. In order to enable the government to know what moral and political opinions have been and are at present in circulation amongst the Hindoo natives of India, Sir Alexander got the late Colonel Mackenzie, whose celebrated collection of historical materials was, some years ago, purchased by the East India Company, to collect specimens of the most popular Hindoo dramas, and of all the popular sculptural and pictorial representations in the south of India. These dramas and representainterest can be affected by the publicity thus tions form one portion of that magnificent collection of materials for writing the history of India: the circumstances attending the origin and progress of which collection, as detailed by Sir Alexander in his evidence, do the highest honour to Colonel Mackenzie, and form a most interesting narrative of the progress of that celebrated man, from the time he was first patronised by the fifth Lord Napier, of Merchistoun, to the period of his death.

We now copy a portion of the minutes, which, both as personal biography and general information, has interested us extremely.

"Were you acquainted, while in Ceylon, with the late Colonel C. Mackenzie, the surveyor-general of all India, and with the collection which he made of materials for writing a history of India? I was intimately acquainted with him from my earliest youth, and I was in constant communication with him all the time I was in Ceylon, from 1802 to 1818, upon subjects connected with the history of India and of that island, and had frequent occasion to refer for information to his valuable collection of ancient inscriptions and historical documents. - Be so good as to explain the circumstances which first led Colonel Mackenzie to make this collection, and those which led the Bengal government, after his death, to purchase it from his widow? Colonel Mackenzie was a native of the island of Lewis; as a very young man he was much patronised on account of his mathematical knowledge, by the late Lord Seaforth and my late grand-father, Francis, the fifth Lord Napier, of Merchistoun. He was for some time employed by the latter, who was about to write a life of his ancestor John Napier, of Merchistoun, the inventor of logarithms, to collect for him, with a view to that life, from all the different works relative to India, an account of the knowledge which the Hindoos possessed of mathematics, and of the nature and use of logarithms. Mr. Mackenzie, after the death of Lord Napier, became very desirous of prosecuting his Oriental researches in India. Lord Seaforth, therefore, at his request, got him appointed to the engineers on the Madras establishment in 1782, and gave him letters of introduction to the late Lord Macartney, the then governor of that presidency, and to my father, who held a high situation under his lordship at Madura, the ancient capital of the Hindoo kingdom, described by Ptolemy as the regio Pandionis of the peninsula of India, and the ancient seat of the Hindoo college so celebrated throughout that peninsula from the fifth to the tenth century, for the extent and variety of the knowledge which its members height of the cone from the top to the bottom, at anding, and to the introduction of a higher variety of the knowledge which its members and seemed to have reached the Piano delle standard of moral and political feeling amongst had acquired in astronomy, in mathematics, Ginestre. Yesterday evening it was equally them; because it will afford the natives of and in every branch of literature. My mother, time with my father at Madura, and employed at Oxford, formed some years ago, partly from the most distinguished of the Brahmins in the letter which Colonel Mackenzie had writneighbourhood in collecting for her, from every ten to me in 1817, and partly from a list which part of the peninsula, the information which the colonel's Brahmins had drawn up of his she required relative to the knowledge which papers previous to his death. - Does the Macthe Hindoos had possessed in ancient times of kenzie collection consist of such information mathematics and astronomy. Knowing that only as illustrates the history of India, or does Mr. Mackenzie had been previously employed it also contain materials for illustrating the by her father in pursuing the literary inquiries state of the arts, sciences, and literature of in which she herself was then engaged, and wishing to have his assistance in arranging the materials which she had collected, she and my father invited him to come and live with them at Madura early in 1783, and there introduced him to all the Brahmins and other literary natives who resided at that place. Mr. Mackenzie, in consequence of the com-munications which he had with them, soon discovered that the most valuable materials for a history of India might be collected in different parts of the peninsula, and during his residence at Madura first formed the plan of of India, that dramatic compositions, and picmaking that collection, which afterwards became the favourite object of his pursuit for thirty-eight years of his life, and which is now the most extensive and the most valuable collection of historical documents relative to India that ever has been made by any individual in historical, moral, and political knowledge as Europe or in Asia. It was Colonel Mackenzie's wish, if he had survived till he had completed his collection, to return to England, and to which they were desirous of supporting. When arrange under separate heads the materials of I sent to Mr. Fox, in 1806, the plan, to which which it was composed. In 1817, being my. I have alluded in the Law Committee, for inself about to return to England from Ceylon, I went to Madras to take leave of him previous to my departure from India. He, in con-sequence of the long friendship which had subsisted between us, and his belief that we should not meet again, addressed a long letter to me, giving me a detailed account of all his literary labours in India, and requesting me, in case of his death, to publish it. On my arrival in England, I explained to Mr. Grant, the former chairman of the Court of Directors, the great advantage it would secure for Oriental history and literature were Colonel Mackenzie to be allowed by the directors to come to England upon leave, in order that he might, with the assistance of the different literary characters in Europe, arrange his valuable col-lection of materials. Mr. Grant, with the feeling for literature and liberality which always characterised his public and private conduct, agreed, on my application, to propose to the Court of Directors to give the colonel leave to come to England, and to remain in England upon his full pay and allowances for three years, for the purpose which I have men- had been conveyed to the natives of India by tioned. No steps were, however, taken by this means, and what measures ought to be Mr. Grant, because in the mean time I re-taken by them for circulating amongst the ceived accounts of the colonel's death in people, by the same means, such historical, Bengal. I soon after, according to his desire, moral, and political knowledge as might be published the letter which he had written to me in 1817, and at the same time wrote to the Marquess of Hastings, the then governor. general of India, calling his attention to the value of the Mackenzie collection, and adding, what I knew to be the fact, that the colonel had laid out upwards of 15,000%. of his own money in making it. His lordship, a short time afterwards, purchased the whole collec-tion for the East India Company from Colonel Mackenzie's widow for 10,000%, and thereby they may.—Have any works been already exe-part of parliament will shew the people of India preserved for the British government the most cuted in England with the view which you who was the daughter of Mr. Mackenzie's valuable materials which could be procured for friend and early patron, the fifth Lord Napier, and who, in consequence of her father's death, had determined herself to execute the plan which he had founded, of writing the life of the inventor of the logarithms, resided at that Wilson, the newly-elected professor of Sanscrit different parts of India; and I have sent it out the inventor of the logarithms, resided at that India? It contains, in addition to the materials connected with the general history of India, very extensive information relative to the state of the drama, and that of painting and sculpture in different ages amongst the Hindoos in the southern peninsula of India. A considerable part of the information upon these subjects was collected by Colonel Mackenzie, in consequence of communications which passed between him and me from 1802 to 1817. It is known to those who have attended to the history of the southern peninsula torial and sculptural representations, had been used from time immemorial by the Hindoo governments in that peninsula, as the most efficient medium through which they could circulate amongst the people of the country such they conceived would give permanency to the system of government and the state of society troducing a system of government throughout British India, more in conformity than the one which then prevailed with the principles of the British constitution, it occurred to me that measures ought, in pursuance of the ancient custom of the country, to be adopted by the British government for circulating among the natives of the country, by dramatic, pictorial, and sculptural representations, such historical, moral, and political knowledge, as might have a tendency to make them understand the nature and benefits of a free government, and admire the examples which they might derive from the dramatic, the pictorial, and the sculptural representations, which might be executed for their use and improvement by the best British authors, and by the most distinguished British artists; and I therefore requested Colonel Mackenzie to make for me such a collection of the dramas, and such an account of the pictorial and sculptural representations in the peninsula of India, as would enable the British government to ascertain what historical, moral, and political knowledge applicable to the system of government which they might wish to introduce, and the state of society which they might wish to form. - Do you think that government can derive useful information from the Mackenzie collection, as to the historical, moral, and political knowledge which has been circulated amongst the people of the country in different ages by the Hindoo government, through dramatic, pictorial, and sculptural representations? I think to India, in order to have it translated and acted in that country. Mr. Stephanoff also has, on my suggestion, made a very fine painting from a sketch which I gave him, the object of which is to commemorate the admission of the natives of the country to the right of sitting upon juries, and the abolition of the state of domestic slavery, which took place in Ceylon while I was in that island, and which were the first instances that ever occurred in India of such events. An engraving has been made of this painting, and sent out to different parts of India. My re-lative, the late Mrs. Damer, also, on my suggestion, executed a bust, of an heroic size, of the late Lord Nelson for the King of Tanjore, and sent it out to him as a present, in order that he might place it on a building which he had erected in his country to commemorate the victories of Great Britain .- Do you think that government ought to adopt measures for procuring and sending out to India, at the public expense, works of art, with a moral and political view? I do; I think that government ought to employ the Royal Asiatic Society of Literature in this country to make a report to it of the particular descriptions of historical, moral, and political knowledge which have hitherto been circulated by the Hindoo government amongst the Hindoo population of the southern peninsula of India, by means of dramatic, pictorial, and sculptural representations; and also of that description of knowledge which ought now to be circulated amongst them by similar means, with a view to the system of government which is meant to be introduced, and the modification of society which is meant to be encouraged in the present times; that it ought upon the receipt of such a report to employ the ablest writers and the most distinguished artists in this country in executing public works for the great moral and political purpose which has been mentioned; and it ought to send these works out to India, and exhibit them, with such explanations as may be thought advisable, in every part of the British territories in India. Such measures would have the effect of raising the moral and political character of the natives, of affording them for their imitation the finest specimens of genius and of art, and of encouraging the ablest writers and the most distinguished artists in Great Britain to devote their talents and their art to the moral and political improvement of eighty millions of their fellow-subjects.- Is the collection as complete as Colonel Mackenzie originally intended to make it? By no means. The colonel, had he survived, intended to have added to his collection a great mass of materials connected with the history of India, which are still to be found in different parts of the country; but which, if measures be not speedily adopted to collect and preserve them, will be altogether destroyed.—Do you think that parliament ought to take any measures for rendering the collection complete? I think that parliament ought, considering the public importance of the object, to call the attention of the government to the subject, and to authorise it to incur such an expenditure of the public money as may be necessary to complete the collection without delay. Such conduct on the ledge of the ancient and modern history of the ington, A.R.A.; "Lovers' Seat, near Hast-immense empire in India, for whose interest it ings," painted by Thomas Creswick; "View is constantly called upon to legislate, and will of Hastings from East Cliff," drawn by lead them to believe that those who compose the parliament have not only the desire, but drawn by Edward W. Cooke. the means of becoming acquainted with the moral and political effect of their institutions, and of adapting any measures which it may introduce into India, to the peculiar circumstances of the country, and to the manners and feelings of the people.-What measures would you advise for rendering the collection complete? The Brahmin who in Col. Mackenzie's life-time had the superintendence of all the learned natives who were employed by him in procuring materials for his collection, is still alive at Madras, is thoroughly acquainted with the plan upon which the colonel, had he lived, intended to have carried on his researches, and is anxious to accomplish all the literary objects of our print-shops! which his master had in view. Captain Harkness, of the Madras army, who has devoted his attention for many years to the same literary pursuits as the late Colonel Mackenzie, who is thoroughly acquainted with the history and antiquities of the southern peninsula of India, and is well qualified in every way for continuing the researches in which the colonel was engaged at the time of his death, is now in England, and willing to afford his assistance in every way in which he can be employed. I should therefore propose that the government should immediately authorise the Royal Asiatic Society of Literature in England to take such steps, in communication with the Brahmin whom I have mentioned, and with Capt. Harkness, as they may deem necessary to complete the Mackenzie collection; and that the governor-general of India, and the governors of Bombay and Madras, be authorised to give them all the assistance which they may require for that purpose, in every part of the British territories in India."

THERE is powerful expression in this head. Such, however, is the force of early impressions, that we cannot dissociate the Siddonian cast of countenance from our abstract idea of the unhappy Duncan's "honoured hostess."

THESE views are engraved in mezzotinto, (we presume on steel); and, independently of the local interest which they must have in the eyes of those who have visited the scenes themselves, the beautiful and brilliant style in which they are executed, as well in the most minute detail as in their general character, will, we think, recommend them to all who have either taste or judgment in the fine arts. WHAT a strange thing is celebrity! Here is an old sailor, who, had he discharged all his social duties in an exemplary manner, would have lived and died in the most profound obscurity: he commits an offence subjecting him to capital punishment, from which punishment he escapes only through the gracious, and undoubtedly in the circumstances of the case, the judicious clemency of the sovereign whom he attacked; and lo! whole-length portraits of him fill the windows

PUBLIC STATUE OF JAMES WATT. THE statue of James Watt, from the chisel of the eminent sculptor Chantry, has just been erected in the chapel of St. Paul, in Westminster Abbey.

Mr. Watt is represented seated, his left hand holding a paper, on which he has traced the parallel motion of the steam-engine; and the thoughtful expression of the countenance corresponds with the importance of the principle which his genius has developed and applied. The drapery (the gown of a master of arts) is simple and flowing; and the statue, considered as a work of art, from its perfect ease, intellectual expression, and accurate resemblance to the original, may fairly claim a prominent place among the most celebrated sculptured portraits of ancient or modern times. The chapel in which it stands is distinguished by monuments to eminent men, such as Lord Bourchier, Lord Cottington, Sir Giles Daubeney, &c. and has been restored to much of its original beauty by the committee to whom was intrusted the erection of the statue. The funds for the completion of this noble work of art were supplied by the friends and admirers of the genius of Mr. Watt, aided by a munificent donation of 500l. from his sovereign, George the Fourth.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

TO A DECAYING OAK. OAK-TREE, thou shouldst not die While the summer-breezes blow, While there's sunshine in the sky, While the limpid waters flow ! While the young birds chant a prayer, While there's music in the air, While there's beauty every where. Oak-tree, thou shouldst not die!

Oak-tree, thou'rt not like man, For the world is sweet for thee; We enjoy a shorter span, If enjoyment it may be. And for us afflictions make Their abode in hearts which break, Evils weigh us down, and wake In the mind continually.

Oak-tree, thou shouldst not die, 'Tis enough that we decay: There is light for thee on high-There is greenness on thy way; And the young birds sing for thee, Making wanton melody 'Mong thy boughs, thou tall oak-tree: Then wherefore fade away? Leave it to us to die,

When young love's charms are o'er,

When sorrows dim the eye, When friendship is no more! When fades affection's light, When our sky no more is bright, When scowls affliction's night, And the storms of passion roar! C. B. MACKAY.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

NOCTES WESTMONASTERIENSES .- NO. IV. " Come like shadows, so depart."-Macbeth.

"SIR," said Shakespeare, in reply to a question of mine introducing the subject, " you ask me the cause of the decay of the drama in the present age? There is not one cause, my good Master _ -, but many, very many causes : and sooth to say, I know not whether actors, authors, managers, or audience, are most to blame in the matter; for, to blame they are, each and all." "Truly," exclaimed Garrick, "the actors are infinitely obliged to you, Shakespeare; it is well none of the authors of the day are here present to take umbrage at your words." "Of them anon," replied the bard; "but interrupt me not, good David; my temperament is somewhat of the hottest, and this matter doth much discompose it. Oh, it doth chafe me when I think of your ranters, and your ear-splitters—your breast-thumpers! Pah! out upon it! as my own Hamlet saith, 'There be players (I could name them, too), that I have seen play, and heard others praise, and that highly,-not to speak it profanely, that, neither having the accent of Christians, nor the gait of Christian, Pagan, nor man, have so strutted and bellowed, that I have thought some of nature's journeymen had made men, and not made them well they imitated humanity so abominably."
Shakespeare here stopped for breath, and Garrick took the opportunity of protesting against the sweeping nature of the charge just made against the histrionic body,—" Nay, not so fast, our noble bard," said he; "albeit I bow to your decision; yet," continued he, self-complacently surveying his own person (for the little man, as is well known, was indifferently well stocked in the matter of vanity)-" yet there are, I think, some exceptions-our friend John Kemble here, and Mrs. Siddons." (These two had just joined us.) " And thyself, good David, thou wouldst say; ah! is't not so?-nay, never blush, man! would that the actors of the present day were such as thee! You ne'er o'erstept the modesty of nature: but for the present race"— " Nay," said I, venturing to interrupt him, " consider, sir, we have our Kean, our Young, our Macready, our C. Kemble; and for our ladies, Miss Kemble, Miss Kelly, and"—
"And some few more," returned Shakespeare; " and for the rest, what are they? a set of robustious, perriwig-pated fellows-a set of nobodies; 'such men,' as Falstaff hath it, 'as you would make after supper out of a cheese paring,'-that fling their arms and legs about like the sails of a windmill, and bellow, God save the mark ! as if they were hallooing on a pack of hounds. But I will tell you, sir, where at least one cause of the misfortune lies : it is, I think you moderns call it, the starring system. Truly, in my time ours was a most dull hemisphere, seeing we had no stars at all. Your managers give one or two good actors, which I will not deny you possess, enormous salaries—salaries that, in my day, would have made a player a prince; while the rest, the underlings, alas, poor devils! have enough to starve on; and, by the mass! amply sufficient is it for their abilities." "But I have heard," said I, "other causes assigned: such as the fickle patronage of -a favourite old actor being run after. while rising merit is either not discovered at all or at least chilled with little encouragement. " Verily, sir," answered Shakespeare, " you are right; the public are to blame, but not so much as their instructors. Why, I hear it is now-a-days complained that the theatres are deserted. This is the reason: who will go and see bad plays, worse acted? I should marvel much if any body would that knew a hawk from a handsaw." "In my opinion," said Garrick, "the largeness of the houses is much against the development of a good actor; for unless both his voice and his features are of gigantic proportions, neither the sound of the one nor the expression of the other can be caught but by a very small portion of the audience. The result is, that modern performers rely on exaggerated action and grimace, instead of exhibiting the delicate manifestations of shades of character." "We at Athens," said Euripides, "provided against that with our masks and sounding vases placed under the proscenium." "Yet," said Shakespeare, smiling, " my very good laudator temporis acti, those were but clumsy contrivances, and even now you approved of our rejecting them. I was shewn one of those same masks the other day : why, man, who ever saw a woman with a mouth like that of a cannon? and then the two sides of the same face any thing but brothers-one cheek laughing, t'other weeping-a quaint device and a clever! But to the subject: David, thou art right_thou art very right, in what thou affirmest touching the size of the houses. All the theatres that were in London in my day would have gone inside your present Covent Garden. My own immortal ears were sorely tasked the other night to hear Miss Kemble. Your niece, Mrs. Siddons, is an ingenious young lady, and a great favourite of mine. After all, the true reason is the avarice of you managers and pro-prietors, Master David Garrick. You tempt the cupidity of a popular actor with an enormous salary, and must then have large houses and "I confess, high prices to save you from ruin. said Garrick, "that the charge is well founded though it is not one to which I am inclined to plead guilty. But to return to what I before remarked concerning the size of the theatres modern managers, in order to attract an audience to half hear their performances, resort to the exhibition of what is now called spectacle; a beautiful diorama, or a splendid processson a horrible incantation scene, or tame lions and elephants. Can any one wonder at the deterioration of the public taste, when those whose province it is to direct and polish it, minister only to its enervation? Abstract the cruelty, the Roman gladiators were a nobler sight. " By Hercules! a noble sight," exclaimed Plautus, who had been listening attentively to the discussion, and was beginning to describe a combat; but Archbishop Potter having caught the word gladiator, carried him off to question him on the subject of the exact difference be-tween the "Supposititi" and "Postulatitii." "But," said John Kemble, who had till now been an auditor, "is not the deficiency of good modern plays... I mean original pieces... one great cause of the decay of the drama?"

"Twere hard to say," resumed Shakespeare,
"whether that poetic dearth be a cause or an effect. That, however, is indifferent: there is a dearth; and wherefore? there's the rub. Can any one expect a poet to produce an original play, when a translation or adaptation from a foreign stock pays him as well, if not better? when the merest smatterer in French gains as much popularity, by the mere labour of grammar and dictionary, as your best writers can ever hope to attain by the brightest emanations of their own original genius. I am far from underrating the merits of your countrymen, Racine; but I do protest against the custom that mine have fallen into, of indolently borrowing from you instead of relying on their own intellectual powers. And I also protest against the vitiated taste of that public which awards the same applause and success alike to each. The true cause, however, after all, is not, as some superficial persons have, in the plenitude of their wisdom, imagined, that the present is not a dramatic age; as if, forsooth, mankind did not now possess the same passions as ever and as if those passions of love, hate, fear, jealousy, revenge, were hunted from the world, or at least confined themselves to the wild energies of savage life, and are now playing the hermits in the pathless desert, to lament in penance the scath and wo which they have already wrought on this fair earth. The nature of man is ever the same-mixed up of the same elements, each one in turn predominating. Are the moving accidents by flood and field which befel Ulysses, a whit more romantic or poetical than the adventures of his modern namesake? Trust me, gentlemen, that, though Horace may say, Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona, we may add, and after too, though there be no poet to sing their praises. True genius is never at a loss for materials with which to work. Long, long, have I watched and lamented the decline of my favourite art. Why hath it declined? Methinks I can answer the question. The cause is the insecurity and uncertainty of dramatic property, which, however, it likes me much to behold, is now about to be remedied; and truly it had need. Why, sirs, I have known a clever and aspiring young poet send a play to one of your theatres, and after waiting for more than a year and a half, at length receive it back with a polite letter from the manager, to the effect, that, although his piece was a very good piece, it would not suit the stage. Imagine the long-cherished hopes of dramatic celebrity thus rudely crushed! Then, again, if a play is accepted, the annoyances and disgusts to which the unhappy author is exposed! Mr. A. will not perform because Mr. B.'s part is too prominent-he is jealous of B. gaining as much applause as himself. Well, and after all these obstacles are surmounted, his piece may be condemned by a prejudiced or senseless audi-ence; and if successful, pirates start up in every direction, and it is murdered, and the author robbed without the smallest remedy. What is the consequence of this? Few persons of dramatic genius who can write a novel, will waste their time on a play. They prefer the certain profits and legal property in the one, to the doubtful success and precarious tenure of the other. The talent, therefore, which would otherwise have been manifested in the composition of a tragedy or a comedy, is converted into the three volumes of a romance: and so long as your present system, Mr. ——, lasts, such will be the case." "There can be no question, Shakespeare," said Garrick, joining in, "that the causes you have stated are the correct and real ones. That system of pirating successful plays, is, to say nothing of its want of morality, equally injurious to managers, to authors, and to the public. To the former, inas-much as their lawfully obtained property is invaded: a play, for which, perhaps, they have given a large sum of money, and have been at great expense in bringing out, is immediately because managers will not, nor can it be expected that they should, give so much for that, their right to which they have no means of maintaining, and for which, being assailed, they can obtain no redress. To the public it is detrimental, as it deprives them of that variety which they would otherwise enjoy; and they are disgusted at being compelled, by the competition of managers, either to stay away entirely from the theatres, or to see the same piece every night at each." "It has been asserted likewise." I ventured to add, "that the high prices and late hours contribute to withdraw the public from the theatres. With respect to the former, a dozen books can be obtained from a circulating library for the same money which only procures a few hours' enjoyment in witnessing a dra-matic performance." "And of course," said Garrick, "every one would rather have a week's than a single evening's amusement and instruction. This is natural enough; and to remedy it, prices must be lowered. The lateness of the hours is, as you say, Mr. —, a very great objection. I have observed no fewer than four, and sometimes even five, pieces advertised for the same evening. People pay to be amused, and not to be fatigued. No one's attention can be sustained for so long a period as six hours. That is turning pleasure periou as six hours. That is taking present into pain, bodily as well as mental." "Why not," said Shakespeare, "have but a single piece, and begin earlier?" "Ay," said Euripides, "in the middle of the day, as we did at Athens." "Still harping on Athens, my good old Greek," replied Shakespeare. "The middle of the day would not do at all. You forget that you had your plays only at festival and holyday times, whereas now we have them constantly: and it is in the daytime that persons who have any thing to do must do it, and reserve their amusements for the evening." "I believe, too," said Garrick, "that the fashionables complain that the hour of commencement interferes with their dinner. I never heard that the hours of the Opera were objected to, though the difference of time is very little between their opening and that of the theatre." "I think," said John Kemble, "I could propose what would be approved by all. It is to commence at eight have but a single piece, or, if short, at most two; and to lower the prices of admission. with the proper remedies being applied to the other causes of its decay, would, I am persuaded, reinstate the drama in its pristine palmy state.

Our attention was here attracted by a loud uproar of contending voices in a distant part of the Abbey. On approaching the scene of contention, we found that the dispute was between Milton and Dr. Bentley. The poet had accused the critic of mutilating and disfiguring his works; which the latter very angrily denied, and became loud and boisterous in defence of his edition of the poet.

DRAMA.

HAVMARKET.

MR. MONCRIEFF's new comedy, called The Peer and Peasant, was performed for the first time on Tuesday last; and, we regret to add, without the slightest prospect of advantage to the author or proprietors of the theatre. It is always a painful task to visit with severity any attempt to revive the languishing Drama of our country; but justice compels us to declare, that The Peer and Peasant, though divided into five acts, and with the engaging epithet of seized upon by others, who reap the profit with- original attached to its annuuncement, is one out sharing the risk. To authors it is injurious, of the least meritorious productions ever sub-piece which will, in all probability, cease to exist before these pages are in circulation, would be a useless labour. We shall therefore content ourselves with observing, that the incidents are few and improbable, and that most of the dramatis personæ have been " old stagers" any time these last fifty or a hundred years. Thus, for instance, the two leading characters, in their manners and pursuits closely resemble Young Meadows and Rosetta. There is a banker also, a bad copy of Old Dornton; a pair of lovers like those in Knowles's Hunchback; and another pair of turtles by no means unlike Bullfrog and Polly in the Rent-Day. There is an attempt, in some of the scenes, to represent the fashion of high life; in others, to describe the modes of business in the city; and in others, again, to give a picture of the manners of the country: but in all these several situations, the author puts into the mouths of his characters sentiments which never would or could have entered into the heads of any such description of persons in real life; and thus he never, by the slightest chance, succeeds in the object of dramatic writing—" the holding the mirror up to nature." We repeat, that we are sorry to be obliged to speak so harshly of a writer who has often contributed to our amusement; but though he may excel in burletta, or parody, or farce (and we shall rejoice to laugh with him again at such trifles), yet when he ventures into the higher departments of the Drama, he must submit to a severer trial, and subject himself to a heavier condemnation. The performers exerted themselves with great zeal; and it was no fault of theirs that the comedy was not successful. Harley's part, which was the best, elicited occasionally a good deal of laughter; and we are not sure, if the portion of the play in which he and Mrs. Humby are concerned, were to be turned into a little farce, that it would not meet with a different fate. The first act terminated with a glee; and there was a dance similar to that in Speed the Plough at the end of the second. The former was coldly received - the latter loudly encored.

OLYMPIC.

A MYTHOLOGICAL burletta by Haynes Bayly, founded on Poor Vulcan, and called Cupid, was produced last Monday, with complete success. Full of point, parody, and fun, with Mr. C. Jones as "a miniature Venue"—such a miniature as a table-spoon presents—broader than it is long; O. Smith as Vulcan; and the pretty Miss Fergusson as Slykey (Psyche); no marvel the audience kept up one continued laughing chorus. But Reeve, as Cupid, must have a paragraph to himself: but no-we were going to describe his appearance; we find it impossible. As he himself says of some items in his tailor's bill, they cannot be expressed, as they are inexpressibles. We shall therefore, instead of our description of how Cupid looked in his wreath, wings, and black velvet shorts, give a very good pun. In the schneider's account are set down some dozen pairs of Russia ducks; on which he exclaims—" Oh unnatural ducks, born of a tailor's goose!" The Olympic is so crowded every night, as to turn more from the doors than it has sometimes been called upon to accommodate during the former part of the season. We very much regret that the pro-prietor has not a longer period before him, during which he might enjoy this prosperous gale, and redeem some of the heavy loss he (and mitted to our notice. To detail the plot of a no theatrical manager ever deserved it less) has sustained. But the close is next Friday.

SADLER'S WELLS.

WE take shame to ourselves for not yet having made a personal acquaintance with the novelties at Sadler's Wells, in praise of which every body speaks so loudly. The Pet of the Petticoats becomes more and more a pet of the general public; and the Red Man, another of Buckstone's very clever productions, has, we hear, made a great hit. Whether as actor or author, we do not wonder at Mr. Buckstone's rising rapidly in popularity; for his many pieces have contributed largely to our amusement; and he is himself, as in both these dramas, always extremely entertaining on the stage. Mrs. Fitzwilliam has also very favourable opportunities of displaying her eminent talents; and with Mr. Fitzwilliam and otherwise an efficient corps, superior scenery, and good management, the Wells could hardly deserve better.

VARIETIES.

Ben Maodui, Aberdeenshire, appears (according to the Scots papers), from the govern-ment trigonometrical survey, to be the highest mountain in Scotland and in Britain, having been ascertained to be twenty feet higher than Ben Nevis. This is a close run, 4390 to 4370. Poor Ben Nevis!

More Pen'worths .- We have got a pen'worth of the Devil on Two Sticks, and another of Shakespeare, this week. We expect to see the Bible (and we wonder we have not seen it) brought out in the same manner.

Göthe. - A medal to commemorate this celebrated writer has been struck at Berlin. On the obverse is his portrait, an excellent likeness; and on the reverse, a swan bearing him towards heaven, with a lyre on his left arm, and his right stretched to the starry firmament.

The motto is "Ad astra rediit d. 22 March, 1832."

German Annual Meeting of the Lovers of Natural History. - The meeting of the association for this year takes place at Vienna on Tuesday next, and is to last to the following Monday.

Embossed Cards. - Mr. Westwood has just submitted to us two of the prettiest specimens of embossed cards which we ever saw, and quite worthy of his portraiture in this style. They represent elegant subjects of entomology, each having two butterflies, one flying, and the other upon a flower. We could not have thought that these beautiful insects could be so naturally represented in this manner. They are quite gems for young ladies' albums; and a present of such may spare many a rhymester's brain from rack, and the pages from very indifferent verses.

Phenomena Accounts from Geneva, of the 18th of August, describe some remarkable natural phenomena, occasioned by the long heat and drought in that neighbourhood. In one case, the spontaneous combustion of grass and trees has taken place; and in another (commune d'Arrache), 250 acres of fine forest has been consumed by a subterranean fire immediately under the surface of the earth.

The Reform Ladder. - ... An imitation of the well-known toy called the Matrimonial Ladder, a dozen of little prints have been devised on the subject of reform, and disposed in the shape of ascending and descending ladders, from the first agitation (a printing-press), through combination, resignation, consternation, accommodation, and consummation, &c. to celebration. The idea is good, and we dare-say the design will be a popular one.

Swallows.—A paragraph is running the usual newspaper round, without alteration, the object of which is to enforce the "impolicy" and "cruelty" of "destroying these harmless birds for the table." This must be cookney sporting; for we never heard of any epicure swallowing swallows in this country.

A Swell. - A dandy, at Dover, was lisping out his wish to cross over to Calais: "But. said he, "I am terribly afraid of the consequences, should there be a heavy sea." "And you may be sure there will," said ——, " if you go; for there could not be a greater swell in the channel."

Where is the Key?—In an ecclesiastical case recently determined, about the right of ringing bells, Dr. Lushington has decided "that the key of the belfry is in the minister"! What chaplains for the Lock Hospital!

Bad Pun.-In each of the three pieces played often together at the Olympic there is a boy, viz. Norah's child in the Dilosk Gatherer, the Sweep in the Climbing Boy, and John Reeve in Cupid: is it surprising that the theatre is buoy-ant 9

A Dog.-A dog, accidentally buried under a mow of corn, was lately extricated alive, in Cambridgeshire, having subsisted without food for eighteen days. Well may it be said of him for tenacity, Brag is a good dog, but Hold-Fast is a better.

Cholers in Ireland.—Our next will contain a striking account of the Cholera in Ireland, equally illustrative of the devastations of the maisdy, and of the ignorance and folly of the perishing people. In Sligo, of twelve medical men only three remain allve. The deaths have amounted to above 900 in a population of 16,000; and after the third day the town was deserted by three-fourths of its inhabitants.

Our critic has prophesied truly. The Pear and Pea-aent was tried again on Thursday—languished through the evening, and will be seen no more.—Rd. L. G.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

Wild Sports of the West: with Legendary Tales and Local Sketches. By the Author of "Stories of Waterloo." Vol. I. 8vo. pp. 327. London, 1832. Bentley.

ONE of those light and amusing productions which possess sufficient interest for readers of every class, and are particularly acceptable to those who take delight in sports by flood or field. As our extracts will say more for Vol. I. than any exordium we could offer, we shall simply state, that by "the West" is meant the west of Ireland, and especially Connaught, the wildest district of that wild country; of which, by way of introduction, we copy a painfully pleasant sketch by the author, referring to a story, previously told, of an assault on the dwelling of a Mr. Morden.

"I have (he says) God help me! no fancy for what the Irish call active amusements. would have no ambition to hold a nocturnal colloquy with Mr. Bulger (a noted midnight robber); nor would it afford me satisfaction to listen to solemn assurances of his determination to cut my throat. I would not give one farthing to spend half an hour in a dark closet with three robbers and a case-knife. I love uninterrupted repose, and it would annoy me to have my window dismantled at midnight, and my entire toilet annihilated, by a well-directed volley of paving-stones. On earth there is not a more enchanting object than the exquisite symmetry of a woman's well-formed leg; but Miss Morden's would have no charms for me, if preluded by a discharge of musketry. There is, moreover, a murderer quietly cantoned within a room or two of mine; and though the man may be 'honest,' as my loving cousin believes and verifies, yet one feels nervous in being within a dozen yards of a man who has thinned the population for the third time. Your stupid Englishman retires to bed after his daily labour is ended - your livelier Milesian then only lays himself out for pleasure, and betakes himself to shoot at a justice of the peace, or, still better, amuse himself with a too-roo among the peelers. Do you go out to dinner? Calculate on being fired at when returning. Do you require a physician? The odds are, that the honest doctor is qualified for a patient himself before he leaves your lawn. Do you delight in hunting? You will find the monotonous period of waiting at the cover-side agreeably diversified by the occasional whistle of a musket-bullet from some ambushed Rockite; and if you venture to send a horse out to exercise, your groom returns solus, to acquaint you that the quadruped is no more, and that the gentleman who despatched him sent you his regrets that he was so unlucky as to miss yourself; but, by the assistance of the Blessed Lady-for they are a pious and religious race—he hoped to be more successful on a future opportunity. Are you fond of a quadrille? Ascertain before you attempt your first chassez, that the unfortunately, a parson? Insure your life to lighted into a cheerful blaze. Old John, with the uttermost farthing you can raise-arrange your affairs-perfect your will-and, if you be curious in posthumous renown, prepare your epitaph; then demand one thirtieth of your tithes—you are a dead man to a moral! and your heirs, executors, and assigns, secure of opulence within a fortnight. All this is pleasant and exciting; but I, as I premised, 'have no ambition."

Of the more immediate scene of his sporting exploits, the writer's account is also very playful. He tells us: "I have no talent for statistics; but if my memory serve, the interesting portion of the British empire from which I write is thus laid down by a modern tourist :- 'It lieth,' says this intelligent traveller, 'under a dark gray cloud, which is evermore discharging itself on the earth, but like the widow's cruise, is never exhausted. It is bounded on the south and east by Christendom and part of Tipperary, on the north by Donegal, and on the west by the salt say. It abounds in bogs, lakes, and other natural curiosities; its soil consists of equal quantities of earth and stone; and its surface is so admirably disencumbered of trees, shrubs, hedges, and ditches, that an intelligent backwoodsman, from Louisiana, was heard to declare with rapture, that it was the most perfectly cultivated territory in Europe. Farther, saith the tourist, its gentry are a polished and religious race, remarkable for their punctuality in pecuniary transactions, and their freedom from a litigious or quarrelsome disposition. The prevailing mode of belief among the upper classes is anythinganianism—that of the people, pure popery."

It is among these persons, that, driven by circumstances from London, our author seeks the renovation of fishing, shooting, and hunting, with a cousin, a resident gentleman, and in all things the reverse of an absentee. Of his household, &c. we select a domestic bit.

"I was (says the author) at the door, engaged in speculating upon the signs of the approaching gale, when old John, my kinsman's gray-headed butler, summoned me to dinner. Some say that a bachelor's repast has always a lonely and comfortless appearance It may be so: I grant that a sprinkling of the sexes adds to the social character of the table; but this apart, with the abatement of that best society, lovely woman, who shall dine more luxuriously than I? Two hours' rabbit-shooting in the sand-hills has given me a keen and wholesome appetite. That salmon at noon was disporting in the sea; -this kid was fatted among the heath-flowers of the mountain-glen. Kitchener and Kelly could take no exception to the cookery; and had these worthies still been inhabitants of 'this fair round globe,' the doctor would have found ample amusement for 'every man's master, the stomach,' and honest Myke might have safely ventured to dinner without his 'sauce piquant.' In due ball-room windows are bricked up, and a guard time the cloth disappeared: a bundle of split of honour stationed at the door. Are you, | bog-deal was laid upon the hearth, and speedily the privilege of an ancient retainer, conversed with us as he extracted a fresh cork for the evening's potation. 'Awful weather in July, sir. Well, that Shawn a tra buoy is a wonderful beast; I knew a change of weather was at hand when he rose beside the shore last night, and shewed his gray head and shoulders over the water.' 'Is the seal, John, a sure foreteller of an approaching storm?' 'A certain one, sir; I remember him from I was a boy in the old master's kitchen,-the Lord be merciful to his soul! Shawn a tra buoy's features are as familiar to me as my own: I would swear to him among a thousand.' 'You see him frequently?' 'Oh, yes, sir; when the salmon come in, he is every day upon the yellow strand opposite the lodge; there you will see him chase the fish into the shoal water, catch them beside the boats, ay, or if that fails, take them from the nets, and rob the fishermen. Year after year he has returned with the salmon, spending his summer on the 'tra buoy,' and his winter near Car-rig-a-boddagh.' 'How has he escaped so long, John? has he not been often fired at?' 'A thousand times; the best marksmen in the country have tried him without success. People say that, like the master otter, he has a charmed life, and latterly nobody meddles with him."

Another tale of a seal has interested us much: it runs thus :--

" 'About forty years ago a young seal was taken in Clew Bay, and domesticated in the kitchen of a gentleman whose house was situated on the sea-shore. It grew apace, became familiar with the servants, and attached to the house and family; its habits were innocent and gentle, it played with the children, came at its master's call, and, as the old man described him to me, was 'fond as a dog, and playful as a kitten.' Daily the seal went out to fish, and, after providing for his own wants, frequently brought in a salmon or turbot to his master. His delight in summer was to bask in the sun, and in winter to lie before the fire, or, if permitted, creep into the large oven, which at that time formed the regular appendage of an Irish kitchen. For four years the seal had been thus domesticated, when, unfortunately, a disease, called in this country the crippaton - a kind of paralytic affection of the limbs, which generally ends fatally—attacked some black cattle belonging to the master of the house; some died, others became infected, and the customary cure produced by changing them to drier pasture failed. A wise woman was consulted; and the hag assured the credulous owner, that the mortality among his cows was occasioned by his retaining an unclean beast about his habitationthe harmless and amusing seal. It must be made away with directly, or the crippawn would continue, and her charms be unequal to avert the malady. The superstitious wretch

Island, and there committed to the deep, to manage for himself as he best could. boat returned, the family retired to rest; and next morning a servant awakened her master to tell him that the seal was quietly sleeping in the oven. The poor animal overnight came back to his beloved home, crept through an open window, and took possession of his favourite resting-place. Next morning another cow was reported to be unwell. The seal must now be finally removed; a Galway fishing-boat was leaving Westport on her return home, and the master undertook to carry off the seal, and not put him overboard until he had gone leagues beyond Innis Boffin. It was done - a day and night passed; the second evening closed - the servant was raking the fire for the night -something scratched gently at the door - it was of course the house-dog she opened it, and in came the seal! Wearied with his long and unusual voyage, he testified by a peculiar cry, expressive of pleasure, his delight to find himself at home, then stretching himself before the glowing embers of the hearth he fell into a deep sleep. The master of the house was immediately apprised of this unexpected and unwelcome visit. In the exigency, the beldame was awakened and consulted; she averred that it was always unlucky to kill a seal, but suggested that the animal should be deprived of sight, and a third time carried out to sea. To this hellish proposition the besotted wretch who owned the house consented, and the affectionate and confiding creature was cruelly robbed of sight, on that hearth for which he had resigned his native element! Next morning, writhing in agony, the mutilated seal was embarked, taken outside Clare Island, and for the last time committed to the waves. A week passed over, and things became worse instead of better; the cattle of the truculent wretch died fast, and the infernal hag gave him the pleasurable tidings that her arts were useless, and that the destructive visitation upon his cattle exceeded her skill and cure. On the eighth night after the seal had been devoted to the Atlantic, it blew tremendously. In the pauses of the storm a wailing noise at times was faintly heard at the door; the servants, who slept in the kitchen, concluded that the banshee came to forewarn them of an approaching death, and buried their heads in the bed-coverings. When morning broke, the door was opened; the seal was there lying dead upon the thresh-hold! 'Stop, Julius!' I exclaimed, 'give me a moment's time to curse all concerned in this barbarism.' 'Be patient, Frank,' said my cousin, 'the skeleton of the once plump animal—for, poor beast, it perished from hunger, being incapsaltated from bilindness to procure being incapsaltated from bilindness to procure the abettors and perpetrators of this inhuman deed. The detestable hag, who had denounced the inoffensive seal, was, within a twelvemonth, hanged for murdering the illegitimate offspring of her own daughter. Every thing habit the deveted house melted away—sheep rotted, cattle died, 'and blighted was the corn.' Of several children, none reached manueurity, and the savage proprietor survived every thing he loved or cared for. He died blind and miserable. There is not a stone of that accursed building standing upon another. The property has passed to a family of a different name; and the series of incessant caheard at the door; the servants, who slept in the kitchen, concluded that the banshee came to forewarn them of an approaching death, and buried their heads in the bed-coverings. the seal was there lying dead upon the thresh-hold!' 'Stop, Julius!' I exclaimed, 'give me a moment's time to curse all concerned in this barbarism.' 'Be patient, Frank,' said my cousin, 'the finale will probably save you that trouble. Our next characteristic extract relates to an otter-hunt-

"The old otter-killer stood beside us: the rushing of the stream prevented us from noticing his approach. He had been examining his traps; and, as the way was rugged, he was delayed till now. The old man's appearance in this place, and at that hour, was picturesque. His dark dress, his long white hair falling down his shoulders, the seal-skin wallet, the fishspear, and the rough terrier his companion, all were in perfect keeping. 'Well, Antony, what sport?' 'Little to speak of, Master Julius; I suspect the trap wants oiling, for there was an otter's spraints (marks or traces left by the animal) every place about it. I went to the lake yonder, and while the breeze kept up, the fish took well. I killed a dozen red trout.' 'Did you meet any of the gentlefolk, friend Antony? This is just the night that one would expect to find them quadrilling upon some green and mossy hillock. The old man smiled, and turned to me, 'Well, well, the master won't believe in them; but if he had seen them as I did...' 'And did you really see them?' 'God knows, I tell you truth, sir.' Then, resting himself on a rock, he thus continued:- 'It will be eleven years next month, I was hunting otters at Lough na Mucka; the master knows the place; many a good grouse he shot beside it. I then had the two best terriers beneath the canopy: this poor crater is their son,' and he patted the dog's head affectionately. 'Well, I had killed two well-sized cubs, when Badger, who had been working in the weeds, put out the largest bitch I ever saw: I fired at her, but she was too far from me, and away she went across the Lough, and Badger and Venom after her. She rose at last, Badger gripped her, and down went dog and otter. They remained so long under water that I was greatly afraid the dog was drowned; but, after awhile, up came Badger. Though I was right glad to see my dog, I did not like to lose the beast; and I knew from the way that Badger's jaws were torn, that there had been a wicked struggle at the bottom. Well, I encouraged the dog; and when he had got his breath again he dived down, nothing daunted, for he was the best terrier ever poor man was master of. Long as he had been be-

The rain began; the poor dogs were famished with cold and hunger. God! I was sure I must stay there, starving, till the morning; when, on a sudden, little lights danced before me, and shewed me the hard tammocks as plain as if the sun was up. I was in a cruel fright; the dogs whimpered, and would not stir from my foot. I was afraid to stay where I was, as I knew the gentle-people were about me; and I was unwilling to attempt the quagh, for fear the light would leave me; and then I would get neither back nor forward. the wind began to rise: the rain grew worse: I got desperate, and resolved to speak to the fairies civilly. 'Gentlemen and ladies,' says I, fairies civilly. making a bow to the place where the lights were dancing, 'may be ye would be so obliging as to light me across the bog?' In a minute there was a blaze from one end of the quagh to the other; and a hundred lights were flash. ing over the bogs. I took heart and ventured; and wherever I put my foot the place was as bright as day; and I crossed the swamp as safely as if I had been walking on a gravelled road. Every inch the light came with me, till I reached the boreein (a horse-path to bogs) leading to Morteein Crassagh's: then, turning about, I made the fairies a low bow,—'Gentlemen and ladies,' says I, 'I'm humbly thankful for your civility, and I wish ye now a merry night of it.' God preserve us! the words were hardly out, when there was a roar of laughter above, below, and around me. The lights va-nished, and it became at once so dark that I could scarcely make out my way. When I got fairly inside Morteein's kitchen, I fainted dead; and when I came to, I told them what had happened. Many a time fairy candles are seen at Lough na Mucka; but sorrow mortal was ever lighted across the quagh by the gentle-people but myself, and that the country knows. Well, the master is laughing at me; but I'll hobble to the cabin, or they'll think that the good people have carried me off at last, as they did Shamus Bollogh from Bal-

A visit to Achil brings us to the wild seashore at Dugurth, and some curious anecdotes of an eagle's aërie.

"In a huge and inaccessible crag on the east side of Slieve More, and immediately above the coast-guard station, the eagles+ had formed possibility of being disturbed by the approach posted on either side waited patiently for the of man, afforded these birds for many years a secure retreat. Here, annually, they produced fruitless; and many a salmon, in its transit their offspring, to the sad annoyance of the from the sea to the lake, was transferred from islanders, and particularly the villagers of Dugurth. This morning they had descended from their rocky habitation, accompanied by two eaglets, evidently to teach their young to stoop and lift their prey. The old birds tore up turfs from the mountain-side, rose high in the air, and dropped them. The eaglets in turn stooped and took them up again. This was frequently repeated; and the course of instruction having and inaccessible burrows to those mischievous lasted half an hour, the eagles mounted to their animals; and the sand-banks, stocked with acrie, and leaving their progeny safely in the rabbits, offer them an easy and certain means nest, sailed off upon the rising breeze to pro- of subsistence. Hence, their annual increase vide for the evening meal. We viewed the is wonderful, and the numbers on the island proceedings of this predatory family through may be estimated from this simple fact, that the telescopes of the coast-guard, who gave us one of the coast-guard, who happened to many curious anecdotes of those daring and have a couple of good terriers, destroyed in the destructive birds.

"The village of Dugurth suffers heavily from its unfortunate proximity to the aërie. When the wind blows from a favourable point, the eagle in the gray of morning sweeps through the cabins, and never fails in carrying off some prey. To black fowls eagles appear particularly attached, and the villagers avoid as much as possible rearing birds of that colour. A few days before, one of the coast-guard, alarmed by the cries of a boy, rushed from the watchhouse; the eagle had taken up a black hen, and, as he passed within a few yards, the man flung his cap at him. The eagle dropped the legend of a lawsuit is told, upon the main, bird; it was quite dead, however, the talons illustrative of this their quarrelsome disposihaving shattered the back-bone. The vil-tion. A century ago two persons were re-lagers say (with what truth I know not) that markable here for superior opulence, and had turkevs are never taken. That the eagle is extremely destructive to fish, and particularly so to salmon, many circumstances would prove. They are constantly discovered watching the fords in the spawning season, and are seen to of partnership was resolved upon. To divide seize and carry off the fish. One curious anecdote I heard from my friend the priest. Some cult, and they proceeded to partition the years since, a herdsman, on a very sultry day in July, while looking for a missing sheep, ob-served an eagle posted on a bank that overhung a pool. Presently the bird stooped and seized a salmon, and a violent struggle ensued: when the herd reached the spot, he found the eagle pulled under water by the strength of the fish, and the calmness of the day, joined to drenched plumage, rendered him unable to extricate himself. With a stone the peasant broke the and his victim, for he found the salmon dying in his grasp.—When shooting on Lord Sligo's mountains, near the Killeries, I heard many particulars of the eagle's habit and history from a gray-haired peasant, who had passed a long life in these wilds. The scarcity of hares, which here were once abundant, he attributed to the rapacity of those birds; and he affirmed, that when in pursuit of these animals, the eagle evinced a degree of intelligence that appeared extraordinary. They coursed the hares, he said, with great judgment and certain success; one bird was the active follower, while the duce of the entire stock, and reduced both to other remained in reserve, at the distance of a state of utter beggary. Their descendants forty or fifty yards. If the hare, by a sudden are pointed out to this day, as being the poorturn, freed himself from his most pressing est of the community, and litigants are freenemy, the second bird instantly took up the quently warned to avoid the fate of 'Malley chase, and thus prevented the victim from having a moment's respite. He had remarked the eagles also while they were engaged in fishing. They chose a small ford upon the rivulet which Nor is it to birds of prey alone that the extreme scarcity of game man at my door !" upon this island may be attributed. Foxes are found here in numbers that appear incredible. The sides of Slieve More, in places formed of masses of disrupted rock, afford numerous space of a season eighteen full-grown foxes.

The multitude of lambs lost by these depredators, has nearly deterred the islanders from keeping ewes; and there is not a spot in Great minor larcenies to be unnoticed."

Our next quotation is a whimsical illustration of character :-

" It is asserted that the inhabitants of Innishea are prone to litigation; and a curious become the envy and wonder of their poorer neighbours. Their wealth consisted of a flock of sheep, when, unfortunately, some trifling dispute occurring between them, a dissolution property accordingly. They possessed one hundred and one sheep; fifty fell to each proprietor, but the odd one—how was it to be disposed of? Neither would part with his moiety to the other, and after a long and angry negotiation, the sheep was left in common property between them. Although the season had not come round when sheep are usually shorn, one of the proprietors, requiring wool for a pair of stockings, proposed that the fleece should be taken off. This was resisted by his co-partner, and the point was finally settled by shearing one side of the animal. Only a few days after, the sheep was found dead in a deep ditch-one party ascribed the accident to the cold feelings of the animal having urged him to seek a shelter in the fatal trench; while the other contended, that the wool remaining upon one side had caused the wether to lose its equilibrium, and that thus the melancholy catastrophe was occasioned. The parties went to law directly, and the expenses of the suit actually devoured the proand Malone."

With another legal anecdote we shall close our notice of this entertaining volume.

To trace the history of a particular body of men excites a sort of interest somewhat similar to that we experience in tracing the course of a river: we first see the stream rise and begin to Britain so persecuted by winged and footed display itself; then it gathers strength and rolls vermin as this wild district. Of smaller birds on its way; here a portion of it is lost, and of prey there is a plentiful variety; but the there it overcomes all obstacles; finally, after devastations of the greater tribe cause their a long and varied travel through many lands, it sinks imposingly into the ocean-bosom of eternity, and new waves, still holding the same name, succeed and flow on for their season.

The King's German Legion distinguished itself so much during the late war, by steadiness, bravery, and soldierly conduct, that we are well pleased to see a British pen taken up to do justice to and preserve a record of its merits. It is a compliment justly earned; and it is good to cultivate international feelings of this gratifying kind. To military readers especially, we think the relation will be most acceptable; but even to those who seek little beyond amusement in their studies, it will afford sufficient entertainment. It is, indeed. a very clever view of the war, arranged from the best published authorities, and rendered more original and graphic by the addition of accounts from manuscript journals, Hanoverian documents, &c. &c. of those engagements in which the legion bore a conspicuous share, and of the lesser affairs which form no part of general despatches.

Major Beamish sets out with the French occupation of Hanover in 1803, which he attributes in its mode of easy accomplishment to the blundering of the minister, Baron Von Lenthe, and to some mistakes of General Walmoden. Be this as it may, however, the army was disbanded, and the plan grew out of it to enlist a German regiment for England. At first it proceeded languidly, but the insolent oppression of the enemy soon contributed to its accomplishment: the men deserted their country in hundreds, and a very considerable force of fine fellows of all arms, artillery, hussars, riflemen, and infantry, was arrayed in our service.

The earliest event mentioned respecting them might be thought one of ill omen, had their discipline not absolved them from all blame; we allude to an affray with some Irish militia, in 1806, at Tullamore, where some blood was spilt. They were then recalled, bringing, however, some Hibernian wives with them, and, except for this accident, highly pleased with the hospitality they had experienced.

They were employed under Lord Cathcart in the expedition against Denmark, and lost amination detailed the leading incidents—his 1175 of their number; of whom several hunbeing awakened by cries for help—his rising, dreds were drowned by the wreck of transports.

Indeed, they seem to have been unlucky on the water, for they seldom embarked without meeting with some disaster.

In 1808 they (when we say they, we mean divisions of this force) sailed for the Peninsula; and we select, as our first extract, a fine description of the progress of the fleet, by an officer of their 3d Hussars.

"There is something imposing in the appearance of a large fleet of transports under full sail. The mass of troop-ships in the centre -the accompanying men-of-war ranged in front, rear, and on the flanks, and the whole advancing under the safe guidance of the commodore, with all the order of an army marching across a vast plain. Towards evening is heard the signal for re-assembling the ships; and those whose bad sailing has prevented them from keeping up with the rest, come slowly and orderly to their proper stations. Then, should it fall calm, not an unfrequent occurrence at the close of a summer's day, the vessels are seen fixed, as it were, like houses on the glassy surface of the deep. The sun majestically descends into the vast mirror which has reflected his image; and just as the last mild rays of the cheering planet have faded from our view, and a profound stillness reigns, the evening guns burst forth their simultaneous signals from the men-of-war, whose mingled music, wafted in doubtful harmony throughout the fleet, closes this magic scene.

At page 166 it is stated, that at Benevento, a private, named Bergmann, then only a lad of eighteen, "who had already cut down a French officer, and possessed himself of his sword and pouch, being mounted on a fast English horse, found himself one of the foremost, and came up with a person dressed in a green frock and cocked hat, who rode in rear of the flying squadrons. The fugitive made a thrust at his pursuer with his sword, which being parried, he demanded 'pardon.' At this moment one of the English hussars, who was close at hand, seized the bridle of the prisoner's horse, and led him away." This, it seems, was General Lefebvre, the honour of whose capture has been claimed by several hussars. Major B. is inclined to think that Sergeant-major Gris-dale, of the English Tenth, who was rewarded for the exploit, was the individual who relieved Bergmann of his prisoner.

There were 3000 of the Germans with Wellington (1809) at Coimbra; and they fought nobly at Talavera, Busaco, Barosa, and other great battles; besides taking their full share of toil and danger in affairs of out-posts, skirmishing, covering movements, and all the less famous but not less hard and gallant business of war. Of these we shall transcribe a few stories, as specimens of the work. During the period that Wellington paralysed the whole force of France behind his impregnable lines (1810) - " the cavalry outposts (we are told, June 28th) were now doubled, and the duty became very severe. Within the last few days the enemy had occupied the stream with strong Soon after, a very dashing affair took place satisfied with the conduct of Capt. Krauchenberg, Cornet Cordemann, and the squadron of hussars. I request you will inform Lieut.-Col. von Arentschild that I shall take the first opportunity of laying before his majesty my opinion of the conduct of his excellent regiment during the long and fatiguing period that it has been upon outpost duty with you."

This is a proud testimony from such a quarter; but evidently, from the details, not more eulogistic than the determined valour of the combatants merited.

After the battle of Busaco, we find another transaction highly honourable to them; and, indeed, to the army to which they belonged. "Early on the morning of the 29th, large bodies of men were discernible from the heights; and General Craufurd not being able to ascertain at that distance of what description of persons they were composed, sent down Capt. von Linsingen with his squadron to ascertain the point. After scrambling with difficulty over the numerous dead bodies by which their path was blocked up, the hussars reached the crowd, and found it to consist of Portuguese peasants, who were assembled round from three to four hundred wounded men, who had been abandoned by the enemy. These unfortunate creatures had been so disabled, that they were unable to move; and they now lay in momentary expectation of being murdered by the peasants. On seeing the hussars, they implored their protection, which was readily given: some litters that were found in the field afforded means of transport; and driving off the peasants, the Germans succeeded in getting the unfortunate fellows conveyed to the neighbouring convent, where they were taken in charge by the monks."

In a skirmish on passing a river, some days afterwards, a curious incident occurred :-"The little rear-guard preserved a bold front; and when the enemy's advanced horsemen plunged after them into the stream, they wheeled about, and stoutly opposed their progress. Several horses fell, and the riders were drowned; but some of the Germans, dismounting on the opposite bank, poured in a sharp fire upon the French, and covered the passage of the rear files. To meet these, the enemy also dismounted some men; and their fire proved most destructive: the hussars, however, held their ground until the French infantry came up, and then followed the column, whose retreat through the defile had been now secured." And "it is recorded in one of the MS. accounts of this skirmish, that during the fight a large dog, which had for some time attached itself to the hussars, seeing one of them in the water, plunged in, and brought the man out through the midst of the combatants."

came very severe. Within the last few days the enemy had occupied the stream with strong detachments of infantry; and to a corporal's piquet of hussars, consisting of five or six horses, full a hundred of the enemy were often opposed: but the vigilance of the small British posts amply compensated for their deficiency in number; and so much was the enemy's sicut Schoeder was often easily the first in the jealousy excited on this occasion by the alertness of the German cavalry, that a hundred doubloons are stated to have been offered by the general who commanded their outposts, to any party that would cut down one of the small British pickets!\(^{12}\). The many rencontres which took place at the outwith one characteristic quotation.

But we will now conclude

"November 1810. Constant rains in the north of Portugal during the winter months had prevented any operation of importance from being commenced by either commander after Massena's removal to Santarem; and the main bodies of both armies remained tranquil. The cavalry at the outposts, however, were kept in activity. At seven o'clock in the morning of the 22d of November, the first hussars of the legion were attacked in force, and driven behind the bridge of Celarice. The skirmishing lasted the entire day, and Lieutenant Ernest Poten, who had been sent with a strong patrole early in the morning towards Tremeo, was nearly being cut off; this party, however, although closely followed by the enemy, was so admirably covered by its little rear-guard of ten men, under Sergeant Bergmann, that Lieutenant Poten was enabled to bring off his detachment with the loss of only one man and horse. The gallant sergeant, in securing the passage of a river for the main body, had his horse shot under him, but sword-in-hand on foot he rallied his men, then about to give way, and keeping back the enemy, enabled Lieutenant Poten to cross the stream in safety. The hussars suffered much during this period of outpost duty, from the continued inclemency of the weather, and the want of almost every neces. sary that could contribute to preserve the condition of their horses; and being obliged to go into cantonments, increasing vigilance was indispensable. Little affairs with the enemy's outposts were of daily occurrence, in which they frequently made prisoners with trifling losses; and towards the latter part of the year, they suffered much more from sickness than from the attacks of the enemy. Some reinforcements reached the British army about the middle of January, and the French general apprehended that it was about to be concentrated at Alcoentre. This induced Marshal Junot to drive in the outposts at Rio Mayor on the 19th of January, in order to ascertain the fact. On this day he advanced with a considerable force of cavalry and infantry, and driving the third squadron of the Germans out of Rio Mayor, occupied the place. The marshal, in his eager. ness to gain information, came forward with the skirmishers, and was unfortunate enough to receive a wound in his face from the carbine of a hussar named Dröge, which disabled him for a considerable time. The following day the enemy retired, and the hussars occupied their old quarters. For the rest of January and the whole of February, nothing more important occurred than occasional rencontres with the enemy's foraging parties and pickets, in which the allied cavalry had almost uniformly the advantage. Some of these little affairs ex.

e "The French were not the only assailants at this period. A hussar picket was one night led to turn out by the repeated firing of one of the videttes, who soon came galloping in with a countenance expressive of the greatest alarm and anxiety. But his foe had been a wolf! The animal had, he stated, made several springs at him and his horse, and he was induced to fire in self-preservation; but neither pistol nor carbine could divert the ravenous animal from its prey, and he had ridden off at full speed as the only means of safety. The officer who commanded the picket, doubting the truth of this story, went to the point at which he man had been posted; and here the tracks of the assailant, as well as the marks of the bullets, verified the statement of the hussat."

hibited strong instances of enterprise and intrepidity on the part of the German hussars. A sergeant named Westermann, patrolling with four men towards Alcobaca on the 23d of February, was daring enough to attack a picket of twenty-four chasseurs commanded by an officer, and cutting several of the enemy down, he brought off seven men and eight horses prisoners. Cornet Von Strenuwitz, of the hussars, also made some successful attempts to surprise the enemy's outposts. On the night of the 9th of February, a party of about nine or ten men, under the command of this officer, cut down the greater part of a cavalry picket which he had surprised in front of Alcan hede, about eight or ten of an infantry support which was formed in the rear, and caused a reserve of infantry, said to be fifty in number, to take to their heels. One officer and eleven men and horses became his prisoners without any loss to the hussars. On the night of the 20th, the same officer dexterously led the enemy's picket, consisting of an officer and twenty chasseurs, and the same number of infantry, into an ambuscade, formed of thirty of the sixteenth light dragoons and hussars, near Ferragoas. These fell upon the enemy, and the whole of their infantry, with the officer, were taken or cut down. Several of the chasseurs were likewise cut down, and three were taken; but the rest escaped. The officer, who was also wounded, proved to be an aid-de-camp of General Clausel, and had been for several days, with parties in amhuscade, lying in wait for the British patroles; the fortune of war now brought him in, with seventeen of his party, a prisoner."

We have not followed those divisions which fought on the Scheldt expedition, or in that from Sicily against Naples; and have only left ourselves room to notice, that a number of coloured engravings represent these admirable soldiers in their various uniforms. We are altogether much pleased with the volume; and heartily recommend it to the British public.

Memoirs of General Lafayette, and of the French Revolution of 1830. By B. Sarrans, Secretary of General Lafayette. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. Bentley.

THE state of party and political excitement has given this publication a greater degree of interest in France than its intrinsic value seems to claim; and, in the present state of things, a portion of the same interest has, as a matter of course, been transferred to England. Lafayette, though an old man, is the ostensible head of the republican faction; and we may presume that his secretary, however partial and devoted, would throw at least the light of one side upon the subject of which he treats. His statements may become material for history to adopt or to refute; but we must confess that his volumes are extremely meagre in important revelations, and far too dull and too violent even for popular reading. But before we go further, we will quote the author's account of this production, as one of the most perfect specimens of disgraceful conduct, disguised in fine phrases, we ever happened to meet.

"The truth is, and I confess it at once, that I have been guilty of an indiscretion, perhaps it will be said of an abuse of confidence; however, I am proud to say, my conscience tells me that in this matter I have only done what my duty as a good citizen required me to do. In fact, unpublished letters, private thoughts, communications within closed doors, form the principal part of this work: and many of these letters, these thoughts, these communications, have reference to two men whom the revolution of July first invested with the new destinies of France. But, it will be asked, how did such information-for the information is most important-reach me, a humble journalist? A few words on my individual position before and after the revolution of July, will suffice, I hope, to explain this enigma. Honoured from early youth with the inestimable friendship of Lafayette, I had long been in the habit of collecting from his lips, or extracting from his written recollections, notes on the most important circumstances, and most characteristic traits of his long and noble career. My object was to supply in some measure the immense chasm which the absence of his memoirs may leave in the annals of our country; for neither anxiety for his future fame, the interest of history, or the urgent solicitations of his friends, have hitherto induced him to devote himself to so important a labour. Some explanations on points of his political life, little or imperfectly understood, some corrections of historical errors. are all that our most earnest requests could ever obtain from his patriotism, which being altogether real and disinterested, allows but few considerations of self to mix with it. notes to which I allude lay scattered in my portfolio, when the explosion of the three days placed Lafavette for the second time at the head of a great revolution. That momentous event rendered the relations which, through the kindness of the general, had been established between him and me, more frequent and intimate, especially when to crown that kindness he did me the honour to appoint me his aidede-camp. As the friend and aide-de-camp of Lafayette, from the days of the Hotel-de-Ville to the day on which he resigned the command of the National Guard, it will easily be conceived that my opportunities of observation were great. What I saw, and what I heard, will form the subject of my present work. Meanwhile, my appointment imposed on me only duties for the occasion: my situation as writer was not changed, my views continued the same as before; and the desire of sketching the character of the great citizen whom I had before my eyes, naturally increased with the new facilities which my temporary position near his person afforded. Moreover, I felt that the events which were about to develope themselves would become the culminating point, the soul of my work. Half a century, and two revolutions were, I then believed, to be wound up in the space of a few weeks. A king and a court, monarchical legitimacy, and the sovereignty of the people, slavery and liberty, were once again to be brought face to face. Salutary lessons might arise out of this conflict. I was a writer by profession; these lessons were my subject, and I seized upon them for the benefit of my country. I accordingly enriched myself with all the papers, the existence of which my accidental functions revealed to me. I filled my tablets and my memory with all the historical information which continual communication with the individuals then at the head of autho-proceeds to ask, "Have I abused the confidence of M. Lafayette, or of any other person?"-to which we venture to reply, M. Sarrans, you most certainly have, to the utmost of your poor ability. We cannot but point attention to that delicate figure of speech which calls stealing a person's letters, &c. "enriching myself with all the papers."

No wonder that he says afterwards, "In the course of my task, I have been led into more sinuosities than I at first formed any idea of.'

Leaving the preface and the means, the work itself is, we find, of too exclusively political a nature for discussion in our columns; but the following example of absurd grandiloquence will, we think, amuse our readers. Describing the glorious three days, M. Sarrans, with genuine French eloquence, exclaims :

"Where shall we look for a pen that can retrace, that can even reduce to credibility, the immeasurably sublime incidents, each of which would singly suffice to immortalise a century, but which on that day were obscured by that mass of absorbing achievements which leaves in relief nothing but an entire population radiant with courage and virtue. Here are barricades rising as if by enchantment behind the soldiers, who are attacking other barricades which arrest their progress; there are women hurling from the windows paving-stones, furniture, and flaming brands, in contempt of the balls which are flying to strike them beside the cradles of their infants; children waving the tricoloured flag amidst the shower of bullets, or rushing in the adverse squadrons to stab the horse of a cuirassier whose rider is above their reach. I saw some creeping under the feet of the horses, to feel with the point of a foil for the termination of the enemy's cuirass, and thus killing those iron-clad soldiers, whose weight alone was sufficient to crush their pigmy opponents; I saw others clinging to the stirrup of a gens-d'arme, and cut down while endeavouring to discharge a pocket-pistol at his breast.

Now, supposing all this to be literally true. even to the little boys with foils pricking out the soft and vulnerable points in the cuirassiers, what is the conclusion that must be left on any rational mind, but that these women and children had been much better employed at home, and could not possibly know any thing of that liberty for which they were fighting and scrambling, like furies and imps of darkness.

We have just fallen upon another specimen of M. Sarrans' regard to veracity and correctness of reasoning. Lafayette, in one of his American speeches, says: "This union between all the states was the dearest wish of our great and paternal Washington, and its continuance must be the most fervent prayer of every American patriot. It has already become the sacred pledge of the emancipation of the world, that emancipation in which I am happy to see the people of America interest themselves more and more, whilst they afford to Europe the encouraging example of the success of free institutions, in exchange for the evils which have been upon her by inheritance, and over which liberal and enlightened sentiments are daily gaining the mastery." which his sagacious secretary observes, "An allusion to the traffic in black slaves, forcibly imposed upon the English colonies, and now gradually being abolished throughout a great part of the union." Surely there is something too ridiculous in talking of our having forced negro rity placed within my reach." slavery upon our colonies; and it must at least

In every service of peril they have been the first to volunteer; and it is equal justice to add, that in the most dangerous services they have always conducted themselves with the most brilliant valour. THE DRAMA.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee, &c. &c.

[Second paper.]

In resuming our analysis of this evidence, so interesting to the drama and dramatic literature, we may remark, that the order of people called Mimics, or Mummers, originally spread over Europe from the Roman territories; and in their earlier days delivered extemporaneous dialogues, very few of them indeed being able either to write or read. By the time of Edward III. they had become so licentious in England (as elsewhere), that they of Anne the lord chamberlain could take up, as were put down by royal authority. "Suppose any person chose to perform a play for gain or reward, he would be liable to a penalty of 50l.? Yes, for a play not having been authorised by the lord chamberlain. If the piece is performed without the authority of the lord chamberlain, the parties are liable to a penalty. - Though the act says, 'for hire, gain, or reward,' yet if they act for nothing, still they are liable to penalties? No; if they act at a private theatre for nothing, or any think the lord chamberlain could interfere in any private theatre.-Are you aware, for instance, that four of the Kembles once acted together, Mrs. Siddons being at that time the heroine (I think it was at Wolverhampton). and no money was taken at the door, but a play-bill was handed about with 'Nota bene, no money taken at the door; but Mr. So-and-so (naming the performer) has a very excellent tooth-powder at 2s. ld. a box.' And that tooth-powder was purchased and considered as a ticket. That is not a solitary instance to shew that in that manner the Act has been successfully evaded? I am not aware of any thing of the kind .- Now what do you consider to be the interpretation of a burletta? It is, strictly speaking, recitative and song.-Tom Thumb, for instance? That is said to be a burletta, but has not been performed in recitative; and Elliston tried the question with regard to burlettas, and beat the regular theatres .- Does burletta include dancing? No, dancing is given besides. The license gives the performance of dancing, music, and any thing of that kind. It is described in the license; the license itself expresses what they may do.-What is now performed at the Olympic theatre; is there any thing you can consider to be an equivocation of the term burletta? They are performing there little trifling pieces that used to be in recitative, but they do not, I believe, now even touch an instrument, which they did formerly.-In short, you mean a farce, or any thing performed in three acts. All translations from the French are burlettas? Yes. it is an entertainment of the stage.-Are you aware that the minor theatres ever violate their license? Yes, in my opinion; but there is a difference of opinion with regard to what is a burletta.

"How many years have you been in the lord chamberlain's office? Forty-three years. -Supposing he was to give a license for the legitimate drama to be played in any minor theatre, would it be a violation of the right of the patent theatres; would it be an infringement upon their patent, in your opinion? I consider the lord chamberlain possesses the power without any consideration of their pa-tent.—Would they have any reason to complain? They might conceive they had a right to complain .- Do you think the patent theatres would have any cause to complain, supposing the lord chamberlain was to license the Adelphi theatre to play the regular drama? I should think they would have a just cause of complaint, because it would be an infringement upon their patent .- You said just now that the patent theatres have no license from miracles; but so ill did the attempt sit upon theatre somewhere in Westminster, where they the lord chamberlain? Covent Garden theatre not the patent theatres licensed every twenty- it by no other means than the deed by which one years? All, except Covent Garden.— Drury Lane is? Drury Lane is licensed every twenty-one years.—The minor theatres receive an annual license? Yes; and also the Haymarket and the Italian Opera House .- What fees are paid by minor theatres on their annual licenses? Thirteen guineas for the whole season, for the theatres within the liberties of Westminster; for licenses at Brighton, Windsor and Richmond, the fees are 5l. 10s. for the season.—On what authority do you make them pay that? Custom immemorial Has it always been thirteen guineas? Certainly, ever since I can remember, and long be-fore I was in office.—If a concert or any thing of that kind takes place, you charge a fee for that? That is 21. 10s.—For the night? For the night.—Upon what authority do you do that? The same authority.—Custom? Custom immemorial.—What becomes of those fees? They are divided among the officers of the chamberlain's department, according to their particular situations.-And do they go towards the salaries of the officers, or are they perquisites of the office? They are perquisites of the office.-You have salaries besides, have you? Yes; it would be a very bad thing if we had not.—How far back have you proof of thirteen guineas being paid? I should suppose as far back as any thing we can shew with respect to the license.-Do you mean proof of that exact sum being paid so far back as that? I cannot answer as to that being the exact sum so far back as that, but I can speak of it for the last forty-odd years."

With regard to the complaints of the two great theatres, they certainly complain very bitterly of what is allowed or winked at already.

But we proceed.

"As you are aware that, by law, suppose a person pays a penalty of 50% he is liable to no other penalty; so, if I were to set up a theatre in which the profits might be 2001. nightly, I could afford to pay 50% for every night I performed? It is not the proprietor only who is subject to the penalty, but every performer. So that the penalties altogether incurred would be sufficient to prevent their doing so? Yes; every person is liable.-Pray what is the fee exacted from the company of Drury Lane for its license for twenty years? I am not able to answer that directly; for those fees are paid at the various offices through which the patent passes, to the lord chancellor, and a variety of persons. The payment, in the first instance, is made by the sign manual of the king, which goes to the attorney-general, thence to the Patent Office, then to the great seal, the privy seal, and to the secretary of state, and a variety of offices, all of which offices receive their fees ... Do Drury Lane or Covent Garden pay any thing to the chamberlain's office annually? No._Not a shilling? Not a shilling. It was the custom of Drury Lane theatre, many years wo, to pay an annuity of 300% a-year to the chamberlain's office, and then it was reduced to 2001, at the time that Mr. Sheridan made his application for a new license; and then, after a certain number of years, a question arose about it, and it was reduced to one, and it remains now at one; but it is a voluntary gift: it is not a demand on the part of the office at all; for that was fully explained by Lord Dartmouth to Mr. Sheridan. I received 100% ayear; but that is a voluntary act on the part of the theatre, and not a demand; and it is an annuity which, at the expiration of this license, may be continued or not.—You can enforce it tory and view at the expiration of the license? I can enforce examination.

How monstrous is this exhibition of the payment of fees! Well may it be desired to simplify the system, and let chancellors, attorneysgeneral, great seals, privy seals, and a crowd of fore me, that those patent rights granted by secretaries, be remunerated by salaries.

It is a very difficult thing to say what is the regular drama, and what is not.'

It is surely full time it should be defined. As far as we can make any thing out at present, we owe it to Mr. Collier's intelligent history and view of the stage, as elicited on his

With regard to the force of the patents, Mr. Collier's opinion is quite damnatory; for he says, "I can prove it by a document now be-Charles II. to Davenant and Killigrew, and which were supposed to be exclusive, inasmuch chamberlain has often licensed the regular as they gave them the sole power of representdrama at the Haymarket and elsewhere; and ing plays at the Duke of York's theatre, and ing all to be regular which are acted at the afterwards, granted a third patent for acting patent theatres, though it by no means follows plays, operas, shows, scenes, and farces, to a third party. > Mr. Dunn in his evidence endeavours to overcome this strong point, by stating -

"In the year 1792 there was an arrangepatent theatres, under the sanction of the then Prince of Wales, Lord Salisbury, and the Duke a week, and that Drury Lane and Covent Garden should not play Italian operas, but should keep to the drama; and that the Opera-house should play only those two nights, except in cases of benefits on a Thursday, and masquerades and so forth. There was likewise a sum however, a sum of money was paid to him to withhold his license from the Pantheon at that period."

Mr. Dunn also says, that he has the original Killigrew's patent in his possession; and that Drury Lane claims the same rights and privileges under it,* as Covent Garden does under Davenant's; the two thus appearing to minor theatres would, in the first instance, be theatres? I cannot pretend to say, but a vast the ruin of a number of speculators; but that deal more. would be the case in any branch of trade that was opened immediately; persons would speculate, and a great number more would speculate think it is; at the same time that depends than could profit by it; but that evil, I think, would ere long correct itself. I think the legitimate drama might be acted at theatres as drama which has good dialogue, good characsmall as the Haymarket, or even smaller, with ters, and good morals; I make the word advantage; and that it would not in any | legitimate, as applied to the drama, depend respect deteriorate the school of acting. It on the nature of the plot, characters and diawould afford great encouragement to authors to logue.—You do not think a harlequinade is write plays, if the state of the law regarding part of the legitimate drama? I think not, authorship were also altered; and upon the whole it would, in my opinion, be a considerable benefit to the public, to actors, and to drama, I do not mean legitimate in point of authors. I apprehend that the public have at antiquity, for then the grossest absurdities all times, and especially in these times, a right to obtain their amusements as cheaply as they can, provided care is taken that those amusements are innocent. I think there ought to be no more control over the purchase of amuseprovisions of life, provided we take care, in the case of amusement, that what is given is wholesome, as we take care in the case of food that what is bought is wholesome: by law, no butcher is allowed to sell bad meat, or a baker bad bread."

" Do you suppose (he was next asked) that the consequence would be to lessen the size of the great theatres, and that their situation at present would give them the advantage over any new theatres which were set up? I think they would still possess an advantage in several respects, and, perhaps, to a certain extent in the public opinion. I have been told that they can reduce their theatres in size; and I think the great evil has always been, that instead of multiplying theatres in proportion to the increase of popu-mainder was paid afterwards? Yes; the original agreement, I think, was 16,000%, but there was five years' interest added to the sum that was due.—Then, whether Killigrew's patent was abrogated or not in the reign of Anne, it was recognised in 1792? It was, by the then Prince Regent.—And you have a document to shew that? A copy of it. I believe the document is in possession of Mr. Mayhew.—But did you never hear of a license being given by Anne, by which the old patent of Charles was destroyed and revoked; did you never hear of a document of that sort being in existence? I do not recoilect that I did.—When Anne granted a license to Wilks, Doggett, and Clibber; in short, the only claim you put-your exclusive power on is Killigrew's patent? That is all.—And then at the expiration of the twenty-one years' license you would not apply for any freshicense? Not at all. When the act of 1809 was passed for rebuilding the theatre, it was directed in the act that the remaining balance due for Killigrew's patent should be paid.—That is in the act of 1809? Yes, in 1809.—And was that money in point of fact paid? It was paid 500%, the balance, and 400%, interest, running from 1702; the interest ever since the time when it was stipulated the original payment should be made.—Do you consider that the Itense under which you act is waste paper? Yes, possessing Killigrew's patent. *

"The same necessity existed in the year 1703 (for the purchase of Killigrew's patent of Drury Lane theatre was built, by paying the balance, namely, that they should possess that patent which was supposed to run for ever.—What benefit did the theatre derive from the possession of that patent? As I have stated, the exclusive privilege of playing all entertainments.—Then where was the necessity of the license? They had not possession of Killigrew's patent at that time, and therefore they required in the interiin to get the twenty-one years' license.—Then it was to recover the remaining part of the patent?

"You think the wish of the public is for the legitimate and regular drama, then? I entirely on what you mean by legitimate and regular drama. I call the regular drama, any may be brought in: I do not think the legitimate drama depends on any number of acts. Does it depend on the morality of the play, do you think? Not the least in the world; I distinguish between the moral of a play and ments than over the purchase of the common the morality of a play.—Because you stated so? No; the word morality is to be taken with reference to the age in which we live; that which was legitimate in Wycherley's time is still properly called legitimate, but it would not be an allowed drama, on account of its immorality: the taste of the public would, I think, prevent its being acted with success. At the same time, I doubt whether the legitimate drama ought to be acted without a certain degree of control; I do not think the state of the stage, if it were thrown open, would be such as by any means to dispense with that check which is at present exercised over the drama; on the contrary, it is my opinion that some control would be more than ever necessary then, for more license than usual would be attempted .- Are you of opinion that permission to act the regular drama would increase the receipts of the minor theatres, unless that permission was also extended in point of time, during the same number of months; do you think they would get more than they do now by acting the regular drama? I think a certain number of theatres would still find it their interest to represent the irregular drama .- But do you think their profits would be increased by the mere permission to act the regular drama, unless they have also permission to act it through the season, through the other months? I think very likely the profit of the theatre would be increased, and certainly the profit to the public would be increased. I am not prepared to say whether the money received would be greater or less, but I apprehend it would be as great. If people could see the regular drama, tragedy and comedy, well acted at theatres as large, for instance, as the Hay-market, it would be with a greater degree of enjoyment than at the winter theatres, according to their present proportions. .

"I consider all farce as belonging to the ed, and they soon amalgamate with the body; regular drama, whether it is in one act or two, or even in five acts.

"I consider pantomime not the regular drama; I consider burletta not the regular drama; they are acted at the legitimate theatres, but they are not the regular drama."

Mr. Dunn, on the contrary, says, that by the legitimate drama he means (as Mr. Win-Upon the question between the major and In Shakespeare's time I think the largest the- ston does) tragedy, comedy, opera, farce, and minor theatres, and the risk of deteriorating atre was about fifty feet square? The largest other entertainments of the stage, and panthe drama by licensing the latter, Mr. Coltheatre I think was about forty-five feet in the tomime. Mr. Dunn is obviously one of the lier's ideas appear to us to be most judicious; interior: speaking from memory, I should say stanchest supporters of the major theatres, and we transcribe such portions of his answers that the back of the stage from the farthest He says, "I think at present there are not as hear upon the subject. "I think the conse- auditor was about forty-five feet. - What do two companies sufficient to represent a play quence of allowing plays to be acted at the you suppose now to be the space in the great properly at Covent Garden and Drury Lane as it ought to be represented; and if you divide them over the whole town, and place one or two at each minor theatre, you would not have the legitimate drama represented so as to be fit to Do you think be seen. comedy could not be as well represented on a small stage as at Drury Lane or Covent Garden? On a moderate-sized stage it might, certainly. - Better? I think not: I do not think Covent Garden stage or Drury Lane stage too large. - You think not? No .- In the centre of the house at Drury Lane or Covent Garden, can the play of the countenance, which in comedy is a great point, be seen at all? No; but, on the other hand, a smaller theatre destroys the illusion. - What illusion do you mean? The illusion of the scene; if you sit in the stage-box, for instance.-That is with regard to spectacle, or a piece in which pageantry is required; but is that so where no scenery is required? The same objection does not apply certainly to a coat-and-waistcoat comedy, as we call it, but to a tragedy, because fine scenic effects are to be produced in a tragedy, which can only be produced on a large stage .-That applies to tragedy; a coat-and-waistcoat comedy can be represented as well on a small stage? Yes, on a moderate-sized stage. On a small stage you have sometimes a very tall actor, which is preposterous .- Do you not think legitimate comedy, when given on a small stage, is better given, and more correctly acted, as the actors are obliged to be more precise in their movements and pronunciation than on a large stage? No; I think not .- I understand you to say three-fourths of the audience hear at Drury Lane; then, by your own admission, you think it one-fourth too large? That does not follow; I mean to see and hear perfectly without inconvenience."

The consideration ,whether small theatres would be as good schools for actors as large theatres, and whether the drama would be as well performed in them, and whether actors and authors could be as well paid by them, is involved throughout these Minutes in great contradiction, which, however, can in general be pretty accurately traced to the peculiar situations of the witnesses, and their own personal circumstances and feelings. There is certainly much weight in the argument, that there neither is, nor can be, a sufficient number of first-rate performers to make efficient companies at a dozen or twenty-houses. On the contrary, we have all witnessed the difficulty of their being an efficiency at the two patent theatres; and that when they chopped and changed about, the effect was very injurious to the best-acted plays. Companies of actors by being kept together give and acquire mutual power and spirit; just as bands of music and regiments of soldiers become more correct and stronger in consequence of practising their art and evolutions. Bring in recruits when need-

* As it is, it is hardly possible to have a full company for any thing even at the great houses—there are only patches of three or four for tragedy, ditto for comedy, and ditto for opera. Drury Lane this season seems to be strong in the latter branch; but as far as the lists promul-gated go, we as yet see little chance of an effective tragic or comic corps at either house.

but shift about and introduce larger proportions, and the chance is that you destroy the whole.

It also seems impossible that small theatres can afford to pay such sums either to actors or authors as their big rivals: their receipts do not form a fund whence this can be done. Still, the competition of the minors, under proper direction and control, would, in our opinion, be advantageous to the public, and to the best interests of the drama. Arrangement might do much; and the division of different kinds of entertainment. Thus, without arguing on the meaning of the term burletta (which was ably discussed by Mr. Frank Mills in a former Literary Gazette); or endeavouring to define the indefinable appellations of regular and legitimate; might not we copy a leaf, hy way of example, out of Paris? Let tragedy, comedy, and farce, be licensed at certain theatres; operas and music at others; the lighter pieces, vaudevilles, &c. elsewhere; melodrame and dumbshow here, and horsemanship and other animal exhibitions there, and so forth; and let none infringe upon the rights and privileges of the others. Give every fair support to establishments upon which great sums have been embarked on the faith of real or supposed protection; but in every other respect throw open the stage as advised by Mr. Collier, under an authority more efficient than the Lord Chamberlain can now boast, and with a ready resort to a still higher power in cases of wrong or contumacy.

We must, however, return to the inquiry, and to the reforms propounded.

The Golden Calf: a Comedy, in Three Acts. By Douglas Jerrold, author of "the Rent-Day," &c. Pp. 66. London, 1832. Richard-

THE publication of Mr. Jerrold's play confirms the good opinion we expressed of its merits when we saw it acted. He is a vigorous writer, and in the present time his force is not the less popularly felt in consequence of his enlisting his talent on the side of prevailing opinions against the aristocracy, and in exaltation of the lower orders, or, as he expresses it, "to expose the vicious consequences of a blind homage to the adventitious advantages of wealth and station." But as the discussion of this question does not come immediately within our province, we will leave the battle to be fought between Mr. Jerrold and the Licenser. There is another bit of his preface, however, which we will at least lend the help of our page. Thanks to the enlightened advocacy of Mr. Bulwer, the monopoly which has so long palsied the energies of the English drama is in articulo mortis; and, though it 'play with the flowers' of venal rhetoric, and 'fumble the sheets' of musty patents, and 'babble' of Charles the Second, still it is growing colder and colder 'upward, and upward,' and must, next session, yield up the ghost. Then, with an equitable protection of dramatic literature, new dramatists, worthy of the times, will be found, who, in proportion to their original resources, will disdain to succumb to the stilted selfishness of individuals, who will produce plays for whole companies—will, in fact, paint groups, and not weary the public and impoverish managers by an endless repetition of single figures.—It may be adduced as an instance of the active warfare at present waged on the property of the dramatist, that the Golden Calf was, unknown to the author, and in his despite, played, whilst yet in manuscript, in the Lincoln circuit, only a week or two after its production in the metropolis." Now, there is much in this quotation both ways. We are inclined to go far with the British Flowering Plants. Drawn from nature and engraved under the direction of Mr. Wm. Baxter, A.L.S. F.H.S. &c., Curator of the Oxford Botanic Gardens. Nos. I. and II. Longman and Co.

THE editor of this useful little work has, we believe, been for some years in the practice of giving lessons in botany, and furnishing his pupils with specimens to assist them in the study of this pleasing and interesting science: but as it is impossible even for the most indefatigable teacher to procure the necessary specimens at all seasons, and few students can have the assistance of such a curator, he has undertaken this work to supply the deficiency; and, by giving accurate figures and dissections of the flowers which he has been accustomed to shew to his pupils, to enable any person to pursue the study, and to distinguish the chacorrectly as if they had Mr. Baxter himself to assist them. Of his qualifications for the task it is needless for us to speak; the situation which he holds sufficiently marks his fitness, and his name is already well known to every scientific botanist.

We trust that his meritorious exertions will meet with their proper reward from the public, and the utility of the work insure its success: for the flowers, four in each No., are drawn with much care and accuracy, and the dissections are numerous and useful.

THE title-page of this little work sufficiently indicates its purpose, and it remains only to and utility, especially in schools. But it merits more attention than is implied in this general recommendation. It is really valuable to philologists, and to all those who are interested in the origin, history, and progress of our language. ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

CHOLERA.

Sligo, Sept. 9, 1832.

 I owe you a long letter, and sit down to fill at least a sheet with an account of my operations in the west of Ireland. Since the termination of my engagement at Westport, I have been enabled to give my assistance to several other towns ravaged by Oxford, 1832, Parker and Slatter; London, cholera, and have in many of them been exposed to the same lawless violence and brutal attacks which characterise so much the bigotted and ignorant lower orders of this unfortunate country. At Claremorris, pitchforks and stones were the order of the day and of the night; and Mr. James Browne, late M.P. and deputy lieutenant for the county of Mayo, at whose house I was residing, and myself, were kept in the street, assisted by only six armed policemen, in open war, until we could obtain the further aid of a detachment of the 83d foot from Castlebar. At Ballina, a town near Killala, where the French landed in 1798, the body of the first person who died of cholera was to have been carried across a bridge for interment; racteristic marks of the different genera, as but the removal was opposed with open violence, and, in the fight for superiority between the mob and the authorities, the coffin went over the parapet into the river, but was subsequently fished up again. On the highway from Ballina to Sligo the peasants cut through the road where it traverses a deep bog, and prevented the progress of horse conveyance; and between this town and Ballyshannon they have destroyed the bridges, and the mail is brought on by a car. At Newport Pratt, a pretty little town in the bay of Clew, the people behaved themselves uncommonly well, and with their native enthusiasm in right or wrong, laid by the sticks and stones to join in prayers of gratitude to those who had laboured for their welused in a peculiar or uncommon Sense. For fare. I enclose some medical statistics of that the use of Young Persons. By the Rev. H. place, which are the more perfect, on account of the little interference met with from professional members, variety of treatment, or the opposition of party. The town of Sligo, whence I now date my letter, and which has been most suddenly and fearfully visited by the say that it is well executed, to shew its value pestilence, is built upon a strip of carboniferous limestone, between a fine sheet of water (Loch Gill) and the sea, and is backed by a lofty chain of primitive mountains, which stretch without interruption to the island of Achill on the Atlantic, and separate it on the one hand from the coal-basin of Leitrim, and on the other from the central moorlands and watershed of Ireland. It is a curious fact, that most of the towns which have been severely ravaged in this each word is found. He has also usually given country by the pestilence are situated on the same formation, and uniformly in the vicinity of the sea. Some of the streets are good, and were then commonly used. As many of our contain substantial well-built houses; but many are the usual cabins, with mud floors, and chim-The poorer neys unaccustomed to smoke. classes seldom use bedsteads. Their food (potatoes) is hurriedly cooked, and eaten half boiled: their habits are uncleanly; and their addiction to whisky not exaggerated by any Irish historian. Cholera first made its appearance on the sea-shore at the base of Knocknarea (a massive mountain of gueiss and mica slate), where fugitives from Longford, and other places visited by | mitted into hospital in the twenty-four hours, | the pestilence, had taken refuge. The Sligonians, like the remainder of their poorer countrymen, whose heads are as impenetrable to the lessons of experience as they are to the blow of a stick, asserted the non-existence of cholera. It was the old game played before my eyes for the fifteenth time since the arrival of the pestilence at Sunderland. The doctors, it was uniformly stated, were to have ten guineas a-day; 51. for every one they killed; and to poison without mercy. The deceived and excited populace concealed the deaths, waked the bodies; and when the board was to meet, armed themselves with whisky and cudgels, and walked through the town, threatening destruction against all who had the wish of saving the graceless ruffians from the avenging arm of death. This infuriated mob collected most in Pound Street, a common-sewer for poteen; and several cases occurred there on the next day. A worse scene was enacted a little previous to this. A medical gentleman, whom it has pleased Providence to spare for his coun-try, announced the occurrence of a fatal case of think proper. cholera. The professional men of the board of health denied the fact, and would not even allow the reporter to attend the examination of his own case; and in a published account of the examination, which, in justice to the medical inquirers, I cannot but suppose to have been drawn up by an attorney's clerk, assert there were no appearances of cholera, -- appearances with which I have the best authority to know they were totally unacquainted. But they are all gone! Dr. Coyne the county physician, Mr. Bell the county surgeon, Drs. Anderson, Beaty, Church, and many others, fell victims one after another; and, out of twelve resident medical practitioners, three only remain at the time I am writing! Dr. Leahy, who was sent by the government to afford his assistance, perished soon after his arrival; and was succeeded by Dr. Goodson, who was at Castlebar during the prevalence of the disease, and whose opinions on the medical treatment of cholera coincide very closely with my own. The medical men of the town, at least certain of them, refused his able advice, from feelings very unworthy of a generous profession; and I attribute the great mortality among persons of a better rank of life entirely to the erroneous practice of treating the malady by stimulating medicines. While the people were opposing the board of health upon the subject of selecting a hospital, and the mob had braved the legislators of the town, the cholera broke out, and all was confusion. The disease spread ra-.pidly: the unbelievers crowded into the homes of the sick, and the sound of the wild national chant over the dead burst from every corner; while the drunken blasphemer reeled and died in the open street. A part of the fever hospital was now prepared as speedily as possible; but no provision had been made for the necessary attendance of the medical men, no nurses were engaged, and the first act of independent philanthropy was of little avail. A few cholera cases had been admitted into the fever hospital, where there were still some patients (for there are two admirable buildings, reflecting much credit on the town), and these last fled from the house, spreading the disease, of which one is known to have perished. When the wicked opposition began to cease, and death overcame the furious prejudices of the ignorant, *It is in this hope that we insert this letter, though overcame the furious prejudices of the ignorant, neither cots nor porters were in readiness to convey them to the hospital; and when the mortality amounted to from fifty to sixty in a day, and as many as ninety persons were adneither cots nor porters were in readiness to convey them to the hospital; and when the

there were none to make coffins, and no one to dig graves; the medical attendants walked over piles of bodies to reach the sick, which were finally interred in such superficial soil, as to render the vicinity of the graves as dangerous as a pestilential charnel-house. The number of cases of cholera that have occurred in Sligo, up to this day, amount to 1202, out of which 629 deaths are reported; which scarcely represents the true mortality, for more than 600 were buried in the hospital yard, and 250 in the abbey ruins. The population of the town is estimated at 16,000; but after the third day hardly 3000 persons remained in it.

Such, then, is a general, non-medical sketch of the origin and progress of cholera in a town which had every warning, and which yet remained unprepared. Not on that account should we cease our exertions in impressing upon the world the eloquent examples held out in such a description; and if any thing can humanise the savage temper that begets opposition to huma-

HISTORY OF CHOLERA AT NEWPORT PRATT, COUNTY MAYO.

THE first case of cholera at Newport Pratt eccurred in the person of John M'Guire, a pedlar, on the 13th of June, 1832. The population of the town is stated at 15,000 souls, and it is built on rising ground, on the two sides of a tidal river. The disease had already existed for some time in the neighbouring towns of Castlebar and Westport; John M'Guire had been to the first of these towns the day before fever. his illness. John Hoban, his step-son, secreted a great-coat from the employés of the board of health, after his relative's decease, and became the second sufferer. No cases occurred from this period to July 20th, when Myles Tuny came from Castlebar, and died of the pestilence on his return. A circumstance of nearly a similar kind took place on the 6th of the same month: a female (Mary Laffey), who had lost her mother, and an apprentice in the town of Westport, ran away from that place, and laboured under the malady near Newport, but subsequently recovered. From this time the disease continued its steady course, propagating itself slowly among the inhabitants who remained in the town; for, as in most of the places affected by the pestilence in Ireland, the greater portion of the community fled the moment it was ascertained that there was more than one case. By the 23d of August, the day of my arrival from Claremorris, there had been thirty-two cases and seventeen deaths. As the value of the saline treatment of cholera is still the subject of much discussion among medical men,croton oil and nitrate of silver, in considerable doses, have only lately been introduced into the curative treatment,-and more especially as the stimulating plan, particularly in the collapsed state, appears to me fraught with the utmost danger, it will be useful to notice the comparative results. The treatment adopted up to the 23d consisted chiefly of venesections, emetics, and calomel and opium. When the lightning were at times observed in it. sickness was not relieved in the first stage, effervescent draughts were resorted to: they may be considered as a modification, and a very unfavourable one, of the saline treatment; and in the collapse, stimulants were in constant use. Out of the thirty-two cases which occurred up to the 23d, ten are reported as in the first stage, ten in the second stage, and twelve in the third, or collapse. Of these six died when treated in the second stage, and eleven in the collapse.

From August 23d to Sept. 2d, when the disease may be said to have terminated its existence as a pestilence, there occurred twentyfive cases, and seven deaths; -out of which four are reported as first stage, thirteen as being in the second stage, and eight in the collapse; of which four died in collapse, two in second stage, and one was brought into the hospital dead. One of the former was stimulated by the houseapothecary; one died in town from want of proper assistance; and two died of the consecutive fever; leaving two cases, which baffled medical aid, one of these being above seventy years old. Out of the twenty-five cases, three were treated by astringents (subacetate of lead, catechu, &c.), three were treated by emetics and venesection, and recovered: three had only emetics and large doses of calomel and opium, and recovered; five were put under the saline treatment, (the muriate and carbonate of soda... there is no virtue in the chlorate of potash peculiar to itself, and soda was used with benefit in Sunderland at the onset), of which one died; six were treated by croton oil, in doses of from one to four drops, and soda, of which three died; and three were treated with the nitrate of silver in injections, in doses of from four to eight grains, with laudanum and soda powders, of which one died of consecutive W. VESUVIUS.

Naples, Aug. 18. THE phenomenon of the eruption of Vesuvius gradually abates, and my report to-day will probably be the last. The accounts up to the 7th say, that the quantity of the substance then cast up was so great, that by the accumulation of them the edge of the old crater was raised about sixty feet higher than it was before; and the mountain continued, almost without interruption, to emit flames which rose to the height of a mile and a half, or above 8000 feet. The convulsions of the mountain became more frequent and more violent; the stones thrown up were larger, harder, and in greater numbers than before; the lava, which at first flowed slowly towards Boscotrecase, afterwards, when it became thirty-six feet broad and more fluid, increased its velocity so much, that it flowed twenty-two feet a minute. At one spot this lava formed a kind of lake, or another smaller crater, in which the volcanic matter boiled with great noise, and from which stones were thrown up to the height of fifty feet. Here the lava divided into two streams, which afterwards divided again into several smaller ones. The pino, that is the column of smoke, rose sometimes to the height of two miles, and electric flashes like

A previous account gives other interesting particulars. In the old crater a cleft about 500 feet broad has been made; and besides that, four other openings, the edges of which, formed of the substances emitted, are in the shape of cones, each about sixteen feet high; and what they emit looks like so many fountains, illumined with the most beautiful bluish light. At the foot of these four cones flow as many streams of lava, each twenty feet broad, which, after a course of 100 feet, join into one, which rolls with a hollow noise towards Camaldoli. The lavs, which flowed towards Boscotrecase, and had reached the Fosso de' Fichi, soon came to that part of the mountain which is called Il-Mauro; so that it had come very near to the gardens and the cultivated part of the mountain, which is here the nearest to the crater. On the 8th another current of lava flowed from the crater towards the Crocelle de' Cantaroni, which had almost reached the declivity of the mountain.

You will readily suppose that for some weeks past Vesuvius has been visited day and night by numbers of strangers who flocked to see it; but, what has not happened before, the Neapolitans themselves ascended in crowds, so that the volcano was almost like a place of pilgrimage.

This induced Salvatore (the Guida del real Verevio, as he styles himself) to make arrangements for supplying the visitors with refreshments at the top of the mountain, as at a tavern. It is said to have been suggested to him to facilitate, by mechanical means, the ascent, which is now become more difficult. But, though it might easily be done, it is not likely he will follow this advice; because, as always happens with machinery, many persons would be thrown out of employment.

P.S. The Gazette of to-day says, that all fears which the inhabitants about Vesuvius have had for some weeks past of a destructive eruption have now wholly vanished.

PINE ARTS. BRITISH INSTITUTION.

On Monday last our artists commenced their labours in copying the works of the old masters, &c. left by the liberality and kindness of his most gracious Majesty, and other noble and distinguished collectors, for the improvement of the fine arts. Though apparently not equal in number to some former occasions, there is still an ample variety in style and subject to exercise the talents of the copyists. The principal of them will be found enumerated in our No. 807. We cannot but regret, however, that the head by Rembrandt, certainly the finest example from the pencil of that master, is not among them; satisfied that had it been compatible with the views of its distinguished possessor to have permitted its being copied, it would have put the powers of our best artists to the test; as even an approach to its excellence would have been a triumph in modern art. For the benefit of the younger aspirants employed in these studies, and who, from their inexperience, might be apt to mistake the means for the end of their practice, we shall subjoin a quotation from the discourses of Sir Joshua Reynolds :-

"The great use in copying, if it should be at all useful, should seem to be in learning to colour; yet even colouring will never be perfectly attained by servilely copying the model before you. An eye critically nice can only be fermed by observing well-coloured pictures with attention; and, by close inspection and minute examination, you will discover at last the manner of handling, the artifices of contrast, glazing, and other expedients, by which good colourists have raised the value of their tints, and by which nature has been so happily imitated." Further on, this great artist observes, "I must inform you, however, that old pictures, deservedly celebrated for their colouring, are often so obscured by dirt and varnish, that we ought not to wonder if they do not appear equal to their reputation in the eyes of inex-

whose judgment is matured by long observation, considers rather what the picture once was than what it is at present. He has by habit acquired a power of seeing the brilliancy of tints through the cloud by which it is mind with false opinions, and to send him back a colourist of his own formation, with ideas equally remote from nature and from art, and from the genuine practice of the masters, and the real appearance of things." In this, as in many other cases, a discretionary power must be exercised by the artist, according to the extent of his practice and observation, as to how far strict imitation may be expedient.

WEW PUBLICATIONS.

Illustrations of Modern Sculpture: a Series of

To the poetical portion of this beautiful and pencil. splendid publication we called the attention of our readers in our last Number. We will now briefly advert to the productions of art which Mr. Hervey's muse has illustrated. The first is Westmacott's "Happy Mother." When this fine composition was exhibited at Somerset House in 1825, we gave it the praise which was its due; and we regret and are surprised to learn that it still remains in Mr. Westmacott's attelier. The second subject is the well-known "Dancing Girl reposing," by Canova; of which we willingly adopt Mr. Hervey's own descrip-tion:—" Nothing can exceed the grace of attitude, or the sweetness of expression in this figure. The gentle inclination of the head, to meet the raised forefinger-the chaplet loosened from the hair, and hung carelessly over the arm which supports the languid frame—the relaxation and abandonment of the limbs and the sweet and voluptuous expression of the face, speak at once of the past excitement and toil, and of the present weariness and repose;while the drapery is arranged in folds which (though certainly studied, and even forced) are made to exhibit the richest contours of form, and produce lines (of infinite beauty." The third and last subject is " Mercury and Pandora," a group in basso-relieve, by Flaxman; which, like every thing that proceeded from that great and lamented artist, is full of simplicity and grace. The drawings of all the subjects have been made by Mr. Henry Corbould, with his usual fidelity and taste; and they have been exquisitely engraved -the first by P. W. Tomkins, the second by W. Finden, and the third by W. T. Fry. A more classical and elegant work has never come under our

WE know not what the march of intellect may effect, but we daily see what the march of art has effected; and, with reference to the work before us, we think in many of the subjects it has reached its climax. Though often repeated, we must still say, that in picturesque character, variety of subject, and beauty of execution, nothing can surpass the greater number of these views; and though choice bewilders, we shall point out some that struck us especially, viz. Vietri; Alassio; Genoa; Vico, Bay of Naples; Nice, Albenga, coast of Genoa; La Spezzio; and the Entrance to Ivres. It is perienced painters or young students. An artist examples such as these that reconcile us to the stubborn steel and the mechanism of ruling, which, under the control of superior skill and perfect knowledge of the principles of art, certainly produce wonders.

We subjoin the names of the artists employed obscured. An exact imitation, therefore, of in this work, who have, in our opinion, obthose pictures, is likely to fill the student's tained the mastery in this way: James Allen, R. Smith, J. Smith, S. T. Willmore, J. C. Verrall, R. Brandard, E. Goodall, J. Henshall, W. Radclyffe, J. H. Kernott, and Freebairn.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

THE SOUL.

WHAT St e Soul? It may not be A light which Chance hath waked to birth:

Nor is that power, Necessity, The mother of the earth. Philosophy in vain may teach

That Nature formed this glorious whole; In worlds which science cannot reach, "God! - God made man a living soul!"

What is the Soul? - a deathless ray -A gift of that immortal hand Which from blind chaos struck the day, And held, unpoised, the sea and land — Who o'er the earth shed beauty rife, Who gave sublimity its might, Who waked the planets into life. And bowed the starry globe of night.

From stern Necessity call grace -Call order from the dreams of chance -Bid your material god replace The heavenly fountain we advance? The seasons would return no more, The erring planets lose their track, Confusion stalk from shore to shore, And Ruin shout to chaos back !

Can knowledge, then, oppress the brain, O'erload the reason's glorious might; Imagination's wing restrain, And blind our intellectual sight?-No: the rivers of the world combined Have never fill'd the boundless sea; And what is ocean to the mind?

Like time unto eternity! Not knowledge hath debased the sense, But vice __that, even in our youth, Saith to religion's light, Go hence! I will not, dare not, know the truth! If I deceive myself, 'tis well:

Let me live on, and still deceive;
If sinners tread the brink of hell, 'Twere death "to TREMBLE and believe!"

O God, the Father of the Soul! O Jesus, Saviour of the world! Spread knowledge, then, from pole to pole, Be Faith's bright banner wide unfurl'd. For whatsoe'er the soul may be, Or wheresoe'er the soul may dwell, To live for immortality

Is better than to live for hell!

THE ALBUM'S NEGLECT.

My name is an Album; I am fitted to grace A lady's boudoir: but view ye my leaves-They are as fair and as clear as a lady's face, Ere ever the print of care it receives; For where I have ventured to make a trial For friendship's donation I've met a denial. No one would write in me.

The first was an old maid, both wrinkled and "Would she give me a stanza?" "Oh no!" she was vexed;

" Things had come to a terrible pass now-aďay;"

She exclaimed with surprise, "What will they have next?"

And I thought of the tale of the fox and the grapes.

When she called me a trap set to catch the men Oh! she would not write in me.

The next was a lawyer: he questioned my title; He thought 'twas as plain as the nose on his face-

It wanted no proof, nor any recital-That my name of an Album was quite out of place.

He cited the statutes and Black versus White, To shew his assertion was perfectly right; And he would not write in me.

I turned my attention the next to a parson: He very demurely read me a lesson On whom I should choose, and on whom I should pass on A silent contempt and he gave me his blessing; gaiety,

But as he had renounced all such nonsense and My pages he'd leave to be filled by the laity. Well, he would not write in me.

The next was a lordling, the son of a peer: I praised up his pedigree, talked of his wit, In hopes to entrap him: he answered, " Hear, hear!"

My notion, he said, was a capital hit; But I must allow 'twould be heterodoxy For his lordship to write - he would do it by

So he did not write in me.

I then asked a reformer: 'Twas shameful, he

And he thought I should have a more ele-Were my pages outside and my envelope in-Books certainly wanted a reforming.

And he would not write in me.

A Tory the next, of the Wellington school: He told me I was an innovation; For our wise grandmothers made it a rule Only to ask the pride of the nation; While if I gave way, in this radical age, To such universal suffrage.

No Tory would write in me.

Thus an old maid, a lawyer, a parson, a peer, A reformer, a tory, and others, refuse

To place a slight token of friendship here,

Each urging a frivolous plea for excuse; But the last that I asked was a rustic yeoman; He would not write in me, no, not for no man-For he never learnt to write.

BIOGRAPHY. M. DELANGLARD.

THE cause of knowledge and civilisation has this year sustained the loss of some of its most distinguished friends and promoters; among whom it is but justice to place M. Delanglard, late member of the Geographical Society of Paris, inventor and constructor of the Georama, and author of a "Treatise on geographical projections, or an examination of the principal methods of constructing maps." But his greatest claim to the gratitude of every lover of learning is the Georama, which elicited high encomiums from many French and English journals, and the honourable and flattering approbation of the most eminent savants of Europe, such as Messrs. Alexandre de Humboldt, Malte-Brun, &c. Your own journal was not backward in acknowledging its merits, for an article appeared in the Literary Gazette of the 20th of October, 1827, which ably sets forth the advantages that the study of geography and science in general would derive from that establishment. We regret to say that he who conceived and executed so fine a monument of science, and had contributed so much towards the progress of knowledge, was forgotten and neglected in his old age, and died in London of the prevailing epidemic, the 29th of August, aged sixty-four, in the greatest destitution. This is another striking and melancholy example of the ingratitude of the world towards those whose whole life has been spent in extending the limits of knowledge, and thereby conducing to the happiness of mankind. I am, &c.

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

NOCTES WESTMONASTERIENSES. - NO. V. " Come like shadows, so depart."-Macbeth.

WE remained for some time listening to the dispute between the bard and the critic. could not help being forcibly struck by Milton's gentle, yet dignified demeanour; the mild and steady light of his eye (for, of course, he was no longer blind) gave ample evidence of the capacious intellect within. Calm and unruffled, he afforded a marked contrast to the highly excited and passionate deportment of his irritable antagonist. To us, who were unconcerned spectators, it was highly diverting to witness the adroit manner in which Dr. Bentley endeavoured to shew that he, and not Milton, was the injured individual. He asserted, that in addition to the injustice and falseness of the charge of mutilating and disfiguring his author's works, Milton was culpable of the highest ingratitude towards him. in not feeling thankful for the manner in which his obscurities had been elucidated, and his ruggedness smoothed, by his enlightened com-Master Bentley, a set of __" "A set of what, sir?" said Bentley, turning round quickly, and interrupting him. suffered more than I have from the inroads of these self-constituted critics, editors, commentators, or whatever name they may please to call themselves by, so I am tolerably well able to decide. Why, it was but the other day that my friend Gibbon shewed me an edition of his works and one of my own, by one Bowdler, I think they call him; and, to say sooth, they were so altered, so changed, that I had some difficulty in recognising my own offspring. understand, too, that poor Massinger and Ford have now shared the same fate. Oh the fantastic tricks of these creatures! a set of moles, blind moles, Master Bentley, that grub in a poor author for faults and imperfections, with a most indefatigable industry, patching him, and mending him, after their own cobbling fashion, gloating over an obscurity, or obsolete word, with as much delight as if they had found a diamond; while to his beauties they are as insensible as goodman mole is to the light of the sun." Bentley was about to reply in choler; but Milton interrupted him, saying, " Nay, good Master Shakespeare, your censure is too general; there are some bright excep-tions." "True, friend Milton," replied the Swan of Avon; "but you know they only prove the rule. Do you think that any of them ever set about editing an author for the express purpose of pointing out his excellencies and rectifying his errors? No! no! indeed; 'tis but to shew their own learning and bookcraft. I appeal to all the poets around me; you, Homer, Virgil, Dante, Horace! have not all your editors and commentators contributed more to hide your meaning than to explain it? One writing a passage one way, one another way, and so on, like so many snarling curs over a bone. They only darken knowledge by their wordiness. Is it not so?" "'Tis even as thou sayest, Shakespeare," said Homer. "Think you that I should ever have fallen asleep, as our friend Horace charges me with doing, had I foreseen the battles that have been fought over my drowsy passages?" "In truth, good Homer," answered Shakespeare, "these fellows have need to be grateful to you. You have made the fortune of many of them. And now, what think you they are about to do with you?" " Nay, I cannot guess." "Why, they are endeavouring to prove that you did not write, or perhaps I should say compose, your own poems." "What? what?" said the astonished Mæonian, "not compose my own poems? Now, by—" "Stay a little before you utter your imprecations. Much have I said, but much remains behind. They say that you are a nonentity; that you never existed in propria persona. One learned Theban - I beg pardon, Pindar, I did not see you - a High Dutchman, with a peculiarly melodious name, which, by the by, I have forgotten, has already had the audacity to split you into some half dozen poets, of which corporate body you are but the personification, the abstract idea, as my friend Locke would call you." "Really, Shakespeare," said Homer, who seemed to suspect that the other was endeavouring to mystify him, " you might mentator. "Commentators!" here exclaimed have chosen some more appropriate object to Shakespeare, "talk not to us of commentators, exercise your wit upon." "My wit! most noble bard; 'twere sacrilege an it were so," replied Shakespeare: "I have but told you what is the fact, I do assure you. After seven cities have so long contended for the honour of having given you birth, this erudite Goth, this learned leviathan, pretends to have discovered that you were never born at all! Alas! poor Homer! this is horrible, most horrible! I fancy, some thousand years hence, the same will be my fate; so that it beseems me to pity you." Homer, on the positive as-surance which he thus received, that Shakespeare's intelligence was true, seemed lost in amazement: for some minutes he was speechless: at last he broke out in a melancholy strain _ " Is this then my reward? Is this then the gratitude I meet with after ministering to the delight of ages? What! am I to be stripped of my honours? Are my hardearned laurels to be thus rudely torn from that brow on which they so long have bloomed? Alas! alas! and this is fame!" His emotion now became so great as to deprive him of utterance: he looked round upon us with an expression of unspeakable anguish, and then slowly retired from our circle, to seek consolation in solitude. To our sorrow for the unhappy bard succeeded a feeling of indignation against him who was the cause, and several around me expressed themselves in no measured terms concerning the barbarity and senselessness of the wretched critic: even coiles himself, the scourge of Homer, as he was called, was loud in his anathemas against the leaden-headed Vandal. Bentley, the only one among us who seemed unmoved, was about to renew his attack on Milton; but, on looking round for the object of his wrath, he found he had disappeared. He had followed Homer, with the benevolent design of endeavouring to comfort him in his affliction. The company now began to break up into little knots: I remained with Garrick and Shakespeare. Our conversation continued, as before we were interrupted by the clamour created by Dr. Bent. ley, on the subject of the drama. I was delighted with the paternal interest which shakespeare seemed to take in every thing concerning it. He appeared to be familiarly acquainted with every piece that had been performed, and was now become a most acute critic; his judgment concerning their merits was incontrovertible. He censured faults without ceremony; nor did he, by any means, spare his own. He was particularly severe on Catherine of Cleves; the author of which he accused of stealing the incident of the handkerchief from him. "I should not." said he. "find so much fault with him had he made a skilful use of it. Although I have said that

' Trifles, light as air, Are to the jealous confirmation strong As proofs of holy writ, yet it does seem to me, that the Duke of Guise simply finding his wife's handkerchief lying on a sofa, does not afford sufficient cause for the emotion awakened in him. Had he seen it in the Count St. Megrin's possession, he would have had reason. The author has made but a clumsy use of it, in addition to having borrowed it. And then, again, Catherine's putting her arm through the staples of the door, though very heroic in itself, is not a fit subject for dramatic representation. It is mental, and not bodily, pain that should be depicted; else you might have a very edifying spectacle in the exhibition on the stage of all the horrors of the holy Inquisition. The great error of most modern authors, both of plays and novels, is the making their catastrophe the result, not of the working of the passions and actions of their dramatis personæ, but rather the effect of events over which they have no control. Now, although this is in some measure justified by the occurrences of actual life, yet is it unfit for the drama, inasmuch as no moral can be deduced from it. I need not "Be it so," said Aristotle. Greek! so you see that we both entertain the same opinion - that is of ourselves." "By Momus, ye are enough to drive an honest man mad," said Shakespeare." "An honest man! no fear of you then, Will," retorted Sheridan. "How now! Oh, I perceive you are stag-gered! deer-stealing, to wit." "Pshaw! what a pestilent knave art thou," replied the bard, laughing heartily, in which merriment we all joined: "but come," continued he, "if possible, be serious, and tell us what is your dispute." "Dispute! have I not just told you that we agreed? Ben Jonson heard us, and I appeal to him: have we not, Ben?"

"Oh! most assuredly," said Jonson; " you agreed admirably — in never thinking alike."
"Well, well," said Shakespeare, "will you be so good as to leave off your joking, and tell me the matter of difference? Come, 'unmuzzle your wisdom.'" "Now, Ary—confound your long Greek names, my tongue will not pronounce them; come, you are the oldest, you know, begin," said the incorrigible Sheridan. "Ah! Sherry! Sherry!" said his opponent, "I wish you understood Greek, for, by Apollo, I am not cunning in English. But, Shakespeare, to keep you no longer in suspense, we were contending about the relative merits of the ancient and modern comedy. He, of course, is the asserter of the superiority of the moderns; I, although willing to allow that great improvements have been made since my time, am not inclined to admit that my comedies are mere barbarisms, nor that his are the very quintescence of excellence. Here is the point at issue, whether the ancient or the modern comedy is that most conformable to nature." "Whether, in short," subjoined Sheridan, "in plot, in execution, in manners, in imagination, they are equal to us.' " Truly, now, this is a momentous point," said Shakespeare, "and requires due consideration: for my own part, I must confess

VARIETIES.

Fine Arts in France. - The artists of Paris have petitioned the king for an annual exhibition of their works, from the 1st of November to the 1st of February, when the capital is inhabited by the rich and powerful patrons of art.

Cholera at Paris.—They have remarked in the French capital, that almost all the persons who are devoted to research in ancient manuscripts, autographs, &c. have fallen victims to this malady. Also, that fleas have disappeared where the cholera reigns.

A Strange Fish.—This morning there was caught at the Poole, the second fishery on the Tweed above the bridge, a strange "monster of the deep," which none of our fishermen have been able to name. In length it is nearly five feet. Its head is immensely large, broader than that of a common bullock, and at a front view bears no small resemblance to the face of the lion. Its mouth is very wide, and the jaws strong, but the teeth comparatively small. The body is round and tapering, but bears no proportion to the size of the head. Underneath the head are two large bags, by which it breathed. Below the breast are two fins, resembling hands, or five fingers webbed together. It is without scales, and covered with a skin somemoral can be deduced from it. I need not that I am not capable of deciding, seeing that what of a tortoise-shell colour. To us it seems mention examples, as they must occur to you during life I was but indifferently skilled in to bear a likeness to prints that we have seen of the monk-fish, which is found upon the coasts of the West Indies .- Berwick Advertiser.

Young Napoleon .- A life of the Duke of Reichstadt has been published by a M. Fayot. Among other anecdotes it is related, that his venerable uncle, the Archduke Charles, took him on every 5th of May to a small church in Vienna, where a service in commemoration of his father was performed; with which both the old warrior and the young prince were deeply affected. Three dramas, founded on the recent death, have been announced at different Parisian theatres.

Improvement .- A literary institution, called the Australian College, has been opened at Sydney, New South Wales, in which lectures are given by four professors, on English literature, Latin and Greek, mercantile concerns, and mathematics and natural philosophy.

The Theatre Italien of Paris opens on the 2d of October for six months. Four new operas are to be produced, including La Straniera and I Capuleti ed i Montechi, by Bellini. The chief performers engaged are Rubini, Tamburini, Bordogni, Santini, Gragiani, Berattoni, de Magnan, Grisi (Judith and Julie), Tadolini, and Doulx, who obtained the first prize for singing at the Conservatory.

Madame Malibran made her first appearance at the Theatre del Fundo, at Naples, in Desdemona, and was received with universal applause; the king, who was present, joining warmly in the tribute.

London and Dover Rail-road.—A prospectus of this undertaking has just been sent to us. The line is very straight, crossing the Thames between Woolwich and Barking, where a dock for steam-vessels, &c. and a ferry, are proposed to be established. There also appears on the plan, after passing through Greenhithe and Northfleet, a steam-ferry across the Medway, just below Chatham Dock-yard, and above Upnor Castle: the course then taken is by Milton and a little south of Canterbury, to Dover, frequently crossing the present Dover road. The expediency of facilitating the intercourse between the capital and this port, where so large a portion of our communications with the continent centre, is insisted upon, and great internal commercial advantages are anticipated. At the rate of twenty miles an hour, the minimum of rail-road travelling, the journey would occupy three hours and a half; and it is held out to shareholders who subscribe, that the steam-boat alone, unconnected with the whole design, will immediately yield a profit on their advances. The design certainly appears to possess immense capabilities.

The English Opera closed last night; and Drury Lane opens this evening, to play every night till Covent Garden begins, either next Saturday or Monday week.

The Landscape Album is the first of the Annual crop we have seen (except the plates of the Landscape Annual, reviewed in our Fine Arts department); and we are much pleased with the simple and neat exterior Mr. Tilt has given it. Of the sixty British views, engraved after Westall, and the descriptions by Mr. Moule, we shall treat in our next No.

Bull.—An Irish gentleman, speaking to a friend on 'Change the other day of the popular account of the Bank, recently published under the quaint title of "the Life and Adventures of the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street, written by herself," said, that the author must be very desirous of not being known, since he had by herself," said, that the author must be very desirous of not being known, since he had fathered it on another woman.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

Legends of the Library at Lilies. By the Lord and Lady there. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Longman and Co.

lively sketch from actual existence. We have haste. often had occasion to eulogise Lord Nugent's talent for telling short stories - a most rare many old favourites, and some pleasant novelties. The Lady of Lilies, too, has been a worthy coadjutor, and well deserves a seat in the sanctum thus described :-

for spacious halls and gorgeous canopies the eye may search in vain within. But for the warm cheer of the little oak library, - for the quaint carvings, the tracery of other times, which abound therein,-for the awful note of the blood-hound, baying upon his midnight hooting owl from his hereditary chamber in the roof, - and for the tunefulness of the cooing wood-quests, and the morning rooks which bustle and caw, and of the high winds that pipe and roar, daily and nightly, through the boughs,—and for the deep glossy verdure of the pastures stretching forth to the brave distant hills which fence the vale,-to those who in such things take delight, Lilies hath still its charms. From the fireside of the afore-mentioned little oak library the following legends proceed."

Among the most amusing stories, we would mention, "The Confessions of a Suspicious Gentleman;" " The Feaste of Alle Deuiles," a perfect imitation of the old ballad; "Misadventures of a Short-sighted Man;" "Mrs. Allington's Pic.Nic;" "The Man and the Lioness;" and "Apropos of Bread:" but these having been scattered through various periodicals, we prefer selecting what we at least do not remember. From a very lively paper called, "The First Fit of the Gout," we have taken a selection of notes; premising, that the sufferer has been rather of a lady-killer, and that the person who is reading them to him is his poor, dear, attentive, simple-hearted wife.

My amiable friend must forgive me, if I say he one, as our magazines and annuals can most is unkind. I am too sensitive—they bore me. Adieu for ever! unless X. Y. Z. you come to-day.

We add a romantic legend as a contrast: we must observe, that the youthful couple had been separated by an intrigue of an ambitious mother, which led to a mutual belief of the other's inconstancy.

" On the eve of the day which was now fixed for their marriage, they walked alone together, till the moon had risen high above their heads. As they were returning to the residence of Aline, Hypolite drew her towards the church, in which, when a few hours more should have elapsed, those vows were to be exchanged between them which would unite their fates, indissolubly, and for ever. They entered, and, passing up the main aisle, approached the tomb of the Belle Chanoinesse. The faint beams of the lamp which was suspended before the high altar fell upon the recumbent statue. Hypolite's arm was round the slender waist of his companion. 'Aline,' said he, 'you must admire the calm and melancholy beauty of the Belle Chaoinesse; you must love this monu-ment for my sake. Aline, it was but yesterday you asked me what had soothed my spirits into patience under my affliction: -- who had been my friend, my comforter? The midnight silence of this church, that steady constant flame, shedding a glimpse like that of memory over the scene of the past day's busy turmoil,—the deep repose of this beauteous statue, so like that which she sought and found, the peace which this world cannot give, and never can disturb,all these were long my comforters. Night after night I have lingered here. This has been my bed, Aline,' continued he, placing his spread hand on the cold stone which formed the table for the marble figure: 'here have I Mr. A. is become rather more reasonable—I rested whenever I could find rest; there was were to meet to-morrow in any other church am to have an opera-box for the whole season. my kind, my constant friend;' (he touched the

'here was the patient listener to the story of my woes, the silent monitor, even the bride who welcomed me, when, as I thought, I was abandoned by my living bride, by my Aline! Her hands are joined in prayer: look at them, dear love; they are closed upon the ring with which I had prepared to wed you. Betrayed by you, as I then believed I was, I gave to this cold bride that ring, with many a vow that, since you were false, no living one should ever claim me as her lord. It soothed my wounded heart, my wayward fancy, to lie beside her on this monumental stone; to call it my nuptial couch! You weep, Aline! Nay, dry your tears; I am wrong to move you thus; and tears enough have already fallen on these cold stones. But we will weep no more; and to-morrow's blessed dawn, Aline, shall begin a life of smiles for both of us.' 'Why did you bring me here, dear Hypolite?' said the fair girl; 'why did you bring me here? Indeed, indeed, we have had our share of melan-My heart sickens at the remembrance of grief, it yearns for happiness; and this scene, with all that it recalls of your past sufferings, gives me a pang which you ought not to inflict. It is, at least, unnecessary now. Hypolite, 'tis strange, but I am jealous of that marble figure. You came to her for comfort, when you thought your Aline false. You came to her, because she could not change. You found here a silent welcome, but it was changeless; and her bosom was to you less cold than that which had so lately cast you away. Oh, Hypolite! if you loved her, how must you have hated me!' 'Sweet Aline,' returned Hypolite, how can I chide you for such jealousy? Oh no!-it tells me of the warm true love that lives for me within your faithful, your wronged heart. But you also must acknowledge the motive which drew me to this spot - to la Belle Chanoinesse. It was true and ardent love for you that made me forswear all other solace than what this peaceful semblance of death could promise me. And now, let us go home. To-morrow,—Aline,—to-morrow!—Hark!—what noise is that?—Who spoke?—Who laughed?' With a slight shudder, Aline clung to her lover, and both It was not repeated. 'Aline,' said Hypolite, pressing the trembling girl to his bosom, 'Aline, we will go. We have been overheard;—and what we have said has appeared fit subject for merriment to some one whose heart is free from care and kindly feeling.' 'It was no laugh,' replied Aline; and she clung yet closer to his breast. ' Hypolite, it was no augh! At least, no merriment was there. 'Tis said, idiots will laugh when they see others weep. I could fancy such ill-timed mirth, a sound so lacking sense and sympathy, in the wild noise we heard. I tremble still. Yes; let us hasten hence, dear Hypolite. It is a childish wish of mine; but, would that we were to meet to-morrow in any other church hopes been crossed. Oh! may they not again be so deceived!' And now, the morning came.

The church was crowded with smiling faces, and the bride and bridegroom stood before the altar, to receive the blessing to which every bosom was eager to respond. It was a sultry September morning, and the gay assembly drew no sad presage from the gathering darkness of the atmosphere, which seemed to por-tend a stormy day. The distant thunder tend a stormy day. The distant thunder growled, and sheets of faint summer lightning flickered at intervals against the purple canopy which gradually deepened along the sky. The priest was proceeding to pronounce the final benediction, and the hands of the betrothed were already joined together, when a sudden and tremendous shock of an earthquake rocked the whole edifice to its foundations. The words broke off. The congregation were panic-struck — many sunk on the pavement with fear — some rushed to the doors to escape the threatening peril; but few had had time to issue forth, before a second shock came, and then a third, to which the high altar, and that part of the fabric under which it stood, bowed and sunk with a tremendous crash. The loud shrieks of hundreds were heard, mingled with the roar of the crumbling edifice; a stifling cloud of dust arose, and for some minutes covered all the building; and, when it cleared away, nearly one-third portion of the church lay in a mighty and confused mass of ruins. All those who had been near the altar had, at the first alarm, taken refuge in that part which still stood. As the trembling crowds assembled in the streets, all were found safe and unhurt -all but one. The bridegroom was missing ! In vain did his name pass from mouth to mouth. All search was vain. Vain were the hopes that he might yet be found alive, though wounded, among the lighter upper fragments of the chancel wall. He was seen no more till several days after, when the workmen, who since that fatal morning had incessantly laboured to effect a passage to where the altar had stood, found the pavement broken into the vaults over part of which the monument of the Belle Chanoinesse had been built, and which now, together with the statue, was in fragments. The body of the poor young man was discovered, uncrushed and unwounded. It appeared as though he had died from suffocation under one of the low arches of a stone grave, which had not fallen in. His body was stretched out tranquilly in death, and near it lay a small skeleton, which had been buried there probably centuries before. A plain gold ring, of modern workmanship, was on its bony hand."

The "Lady's Counsellor" is an interesting legend of the olden, as the " Promise Kept" is of modern time: and any one who has a long morning or solitary evening, which he or she wishes to pass quickly away, cannot employ it better than over these two volumes; we promise such ample entertainment; and offer our hearty commendation to the Legends of the Library at Lilies, to the enjoyment of which we sincerely hope the Lord and Lady will return with increase of appetite, after a sojourn at Corfu, pleasant to them and beneficial to their country.

The Landscape Annual for 1833. The Tourist in Italy. By Thomas Roscoe. 12mo. pp. 271. London, Jennings and Chaplin.

THE fourth volume of this favourite Annual dress) as an integral portion of this publica-tion." Of Mr. Harding's picturesque and artistlike performances we have already spoken, and of the ability displayed in the majority of the engravings from his tasteful pencil; and we need only add on this head, that in several of his subjects he has been very fortunate, selecting them from wilder and less known parts of the Genoese coast, and the mountains round Aosta, than is usual with the ordinary traveller.

Mr. Roscoe (who will not discontinue the use of the no-word "talented") has executed his task with credit to his literary reputation. The text consists of descriptions of the places and scenery represented by the painter, by condensed epitomes of the historical recollections associated with them, and by interesting narratives of love, war, and personal adventure. Of these various features it is not easy for us to afford a sufficient idea by extract; but we select two specimens as fair and as convenient as our judgment could determine.

Treating of the Mola da Gaeta the ancient Formise, and quære the seat of the gigantic Lestrygones, visited by Ulysses, the author says:—

"That the depredatory character of this region was not confined to the sea, we have the authority of a more modern traveller, though he has certainly overcharged the picture, when he observes that 'a frontier between two such states as Rome and Naples must abound in crimes. At Terracina every fifth man you meet is a sbirro, or an assassin, or both. The Pontine marshes were infamous for robbery in Juvenal's time; and most of the postilions who are now stationed there have retired from punishment to the horrid asylum of a climate where none but criminals could be found to reside. At present, the postilion's horn and whip-cracking are forbidden on the roads of Italy, where they served too long as a call for robbers. On entering Fondi, we drove to the custom-house, and there we found a tall Castrato, muffled up to his nose in a cloak, and basking over a pan of charcoal. He struck me as a modern edition of the scribe who amused Horace at this town. Advancing solemnly, with a pen at his ear, he fell into argument with a Neapolitan advocate, one of our party, and he pretended to teach him the law of Naples. Their altercation was at first civil enough, till the lawyer, ashamed of his opponent, called him a musicotto. 'Do you know whom you insult?' cried the man of office: 'I am here the organ of government.' 'And a well-toned organ thou art!' said our companion, ' the prettiest treble that I ever heard in a custom-house. This poor joke cost him dear; for the vindictive scribe returned to the charge, and condemned a small package, which had occasioned the dispute, to be carried by express to Naples, at the punster's expense. At every stage on this road you perceive a marked difference in the female costume, and those provincial modes never vary. The young women of Mola have coiled their hair 'alla lumaca,' from ancient times; for this mode is common on Greek statues. I observed a group of those nymphs standing up to their knees in a fountain at washing-stones; while their idle swains were leaning over a bridge, admiring those co-quetries which are natural to all women on a partial display of their forms. Such figures come often into Italian landscapes; and here the painter might bring in the Lestrygonian princess filling her pitcher; for this fountain, like Homer's Artacia, is a source emitting a without the town.' The description of a quaint old English traveller ought not to be here omitted: 'Arriving at Mola,' says Lassels, 'I went to see Cicero's tomb, which stands in a garden not far off. And I the more willingly believe it to be his, because it is certain that Tully had a villa in Formas (which was this place); thither he was going in his litter, when he was overtaken by the executioners of the Triumviri and beheaded. There are no words upon his tomb, of which, if you ask me the reason, I can only tell you, that either words in prose could not speak, their Tully being dead; or verses would not, out of envy, praise him who had made prose so famous. Having seen this, some of our company and I took a boat and four lusty watermen to row us to Gaeta and back again, while the rest stayed at Mola to provide dinner. Arriving in little more than half an hour at Gaeta, we went up to the castle, where we saw the skeleton of Charles Bourbon, once constable of France; but afterwards, taking against his own king upon a disgust, he served the emperor Charles V., and was made one of the generals and governors of Milan; where, having borrowed money of the Milanese, and having laid a deep curse on himself (wishing he might die in the first enterprise he undertook) if he paid not back the money by such a time, he failed in his word, but his curse did not. For his next enterprise was to go and sack Rome: and there his curse met him as he scaled the walls; and, being shot with a musket bullet, he was forced to pay his debt to nature too. His body was carried to Gaeta, where it stands, with its clothes, boots, and spurs on, in a long box, straight up, with this Spanish epitaph over his head (thus Englished):

'France gave me milk, Spain great employments gave, Rome gave me death, and here Gaet! a grave.'

'At Mola,' says another traveller, no less amusing in his way, 'I asked for a barber: immediately after comes in a tall, swarthy, meagre man, with whiskers, a coat all in tatters, and a spada of an enormous length; in a word he appeared to be a brave descendant from the ancient Lestrygones: after all the Italian ceremonies previous to this operation. he shaved me with such terrible dexterity and despatch that I never before nor since met with the like, and was glad when it was safe over. I did not forget to ask what countryman he could be, and where he had learned his trade: he told me he was a Catalonian, and was just come from Constantinople, where for six years he had practised shaving, but could hardly keep life and soul together, being but a bungler in comparison with the Turkish barbers.' Nearly all that belongs to the modern town of Mola is a single street, extending to the bay, which is covered towards the west by the promontory of Gaeta, commanding a magnificent view of the surrounding scenery. The hill where Formise stood has since become a fruitful garden of the vine; but the tourist may yet trace the remains of a wall of extraordinary thickness, consisting of very large stones uniformly cut in embossments. sort of embellishment they exhibit must have been the work of extreme care and labour, the materials being composed of hard silex, united by a natural cement, to which naturalists give the English name of pudding: and of this consists, in one entire mass, the extensive promontory of Gaeta. The adjacent hills, of which this promontory forms the continuation, were for a long period the haunt of successive gangs of banditti, chiefly deserters from the is now before us, concluding the tour and like Homer's Artacia, is a source emitting a gangs of banditti, chiefly deserters from the illustrations of Italy, "as well (says the adfull stream, and flowing direct to the sea just armies, which, during most part of the six-

These truly black bands, peculiar to some parts of Italy, were no unworthy successors to the exploits of the men-eating Lestrygones; and in fact they formed themselves into a sort of republic, which, if the Spanish viceroys did not tolerate, they seldom ventured to disturb." The biography of Squilletti (one of these) is remarkable enough to claim quotation.

"Squilletti was born about the year 1595, in the small territory of Catanzano, situated at the extremity of Italy, below the promontory of the gulf of Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples. He early became an explorer of the lonely woods, the hills and wilds, around the coast and in the vicinity of Mola de Gaeta. In his youth he was remarkable for his fiery and active spirit, combined with great intellectual acuteness; and, as he grew to manhood, he gave evidence of marked talent, as well as a frankness and boldness of demeanour, which produced a very favourable impression upon strangers, no less than on those who knew troduced, proved by no means equally beneficial to him; for, under their patronage and encouragement, the worst features of his character took deeper root, and shewed themselves in a strange combination of hardihood and malignity of purpose. This was appreciated by the more abandoned of his noble associates; ligion, to give a freer impunity to every species, self with letters of recommendation from in- at his villa Ambrogiana, on which he instantly

Activing at once from high company and from courts, he took upon himself the old hermit's penitential garb, and, with scandalous hypocrisy in a beginner, he withdrew into a small half-ruined church, which lay on the high road from Rome to Naples. There, instead of counting his beads, he noted the character of all those who went by; and when of sufficient wealth, or with other recommendations, he contrived to convey intelligence to the exiled parties, who took measures of vengeance, for plunder, or other enormities, succeeded in his object than his natural arrowhich they perpetrated against their real or gance and love of intrigue armed against him supposed enemies. So well did he play his part, and such was his plausibility and address, in making himself both useful and agreeable, that he was soon taken into the ducal service; nor was he less a favourite with the ministers and ladies of the Florentine court. mediate interview. This, the master of the ceremonies, a cautious man, prudently refused, stating that the grand duke would, on the morrow, hold an audience at Florence: and the new soldier was compelled reluctantly to retrace his steps, and await the hour assigned at the palace. It never came: the grand duke, hearing of Fra Paolo's strange importunity to be admitted, without stating his object, took the alarm; and gave orders for him to be instantly arrested. On the following morning, therefore, the captain of the guard, having meantime ascertained that the stranger had appointed to go to the shop of a certain banderaio. situated in the district of Calimaruzza, and having disposed his attendants at different spots, saluted our hero just as he was about to enter, and, bidding him good day, laid his hand on him, informing him that he was the duke's prisoner. At the same moment his soldiers advanced with levelled pieces, surrounding him on every side, while the passengers and inhabitants hurried in terror from the spot. Casting one glance around him, to ascertain if any of his own party witnessed his denly fallen from his loftiest hopes, into the hands of judicial power, the unhappy Fra quainted with the extent of his prisoner's de-linquencies, and knew what he was about; an answer which closed the door to all farther intercession in his favour. Finding himself thus confined to a living tomb, after making some fruitless efforts to alleviate his sufferings, the intellects of the unhappy prisoner grew disordered; he furiously attacked his keepers, and on partial recovery felt himself heavily ironed, and secured with redoubled vigilance. His aliment consisted of the coarsest food, which he procured with four livres the day; a sum out of which he contrived to save sufficient to hire an attendant, whom, at length, he bribed to procure him some files. By such means he succeeded in liberating himself from his chains. He was already also in the act of making his way through the walls, when an alarm was given; he was again secured, and exposed to severer privations than before. A stone pillar, to which was attached an immense chain, was fixed deeply in the earth, and to this the wretched Fra Paolo was bound by an iron collar, while other irons were replaced upon his feet. As time elapsed, the grief and rage by which he had been before instigated, became more calm; hope yet whispered the possibility of escape; and the desire of vengeance, serving as a subject on which to brood, kept him from sinking into utter idiocy and raving. He succeeded so far as to bribe one of

Moved by this appeal from their old commander, they conceived it touched their honour to make the attempt:each swore to stand by their leader and one another, and peril their lives for his. On the last day of June, twenty-five of the number agreed to enter Florence; and, the less to excite suspicion, they were to go separately, and as private individuals, each intent on his own business. At midnight they were to meet at an appointed spot, and proceed rapidly, joined by their brethren, towards the gates of the prison. Armed from head to foot, they were to seize on the sentinel :- wrench from the gaoler the keys under penalty of his life: and, bursting into the prison, to rescue their chief from his terrific doom; and at the same time give freedom to the whole of the unhappy inmates of the place. By these they were to be supported in their retreat to one of the gates of the city, where a larger force was in readiness to give them support. Even had capture, he quietly gave up his sword to the chief of the police, finding it would be utterly object for which it was intended, it must, useless to contend against such fearful odds. This (for him) disastrous event, occurred in alarm among the citizens, at the dead hour of November, 1644, and when he was in the night,—sunk in slumber, and wholly unpreforty-ninth year of his age. Having thus sud- pared for an invasion of the kind. They were spared the trial by the act of a renegade to his honour and his band, who betrayed the plot to Paolo found his lot still farther aggravated by the government. He yet persevered he succeeded in setting fire to his dungeon, but it was extinguished; and thenceforth only iron utensils were placed within his reach. At length, the freedom which man and his own efforts denied him, age and wearied nature bestowed; exhausted by violent passion, by long suffering, and vo-luntary fast, Fra Paolo closed his strange misguided career,—but not till he had reached the eighty-first year of his age. He had undergone three and thirty years of solitary confinement; and, doubtless, he died as he lived, a hater and despiser of princes, as he might well be,—if not a contemner of all laws, whether human or divine. The crimes committed in his youth had been abandoned, if not deplored, and were fearfully expiated by long years of suffering and sorrow. The cause of his imprisonment was never made known; but, most probably, it consisted in the wounded pride or false alarm of the duke, who, having detected the imposition practised upon him, attempted rather to satiate his vengeance than to provide for his safety; inasmuch as, had his prisoner succeeded in escaping, he would, it is natural to suppose, have retaliated upon his ungenerous oppressor." We have now only to commend this fair popular favour.

The Works of Lord Byron. Vol. X. London, 1832. Murray.

This volume is full of interesting notesmany of the feelings have their history; while it is curious to see how

" the sleeping images of things Start at a touch, and struggle into life."

And its editor well observes:

"The contents of this volume are so miscellaneous, that we have found it necessary to give our observations on the several pieces in immediate connexion with each as it occurs. On the whole, the section of the author's life to which these belong is, perhaps, the most deeply interesting of all; and certainly there is none which has been more clearly and touchingly reflected in his poetry. Indeed, the course of his personal feelings may be traced with hardly less distinctness in the romantic tales of Lara, the Siege of Corinth, Parisina, and the Prisoner of Chillon, than in the occasional stanzas with which they are intermixed—even in the six remarkable effusions expressly originating in his separation from Lady Byron. With regard to the first of those domestic pieces, the Fare thee well, we have seen, since the sheet containing it was sent to the press. the original draught of it; and, had it fallen under our notice sooner, we should have presented the reader with a fac-simile. The appearance of the MS. confirms, and more than confirms, the account of the circumstances under which it was written, given in the notices of Lord Byron's Life. It is blotted all over with the marks of tears. We have also observed, that the motto from Christabel, which now stands at the head of Fare thee well, did not appear there until several editions had been printed. Mr. Coleridge's poem was, in fact, first published in June 1816, and reached Lord Byron after he had crossed the Alps in September. It was then that he signified his wish to have the extract in question affixed to all future copies of his stanzas; and the reader, who might have doubted Mr. Moore's assertion, that Lord Byron's hopes of an ultimate reconciliation with his lady survived even the unsuccessful negotiation prompted by the kind interference of Madame de Staël, when he visited her at Copet, will probably now consider the selection and date of this motto as circumstances strongly corroborative of the biographer's statement :-

A dreary sea now flows between, But neither heat, nor frost, nor thunder, Shall wholly do away, I ween, The marks of that which once hath been!

The saddest period of Lord Byron's life was also, we see, one of the busiest. His refuge and solace were ever in the practice of his art: and the rapidity with which he continued to pour out verses at this melancholy time, if it tended to prolong some of his personal annoyances, by giving malevolent critics fresh pretences for making his private affairs the subject of public discussion, has certainly been in no respect injurious to his poetical reputation."

The notes on the "Ode to Napoleon" shew how often the germ of some prose remark ripened into poetry. Witness the following :-

"Out of town six days. On my return, find my poor little pagod, Napoleon, pushed off his pedestal. It is his own fault. Like Milo, he would rend the oak; but it closed again, wedged cursors, which have won and deserved so much his hands, and now the beasts - lion, bear, down to the dirtiest jackal - may all tear him. That Muscovite winter wedged his arms-ever since he has fought with his feet and teeth. The last may still leave their marks; and 'I guess now,' (as the Yankees say), that he will yet play them a pass."

[&]quot; " A furnisher of the pomp and pride of war."

" Sylla.—We find the germ of this stanza in the diary of the evening before it was written: 'Methinks Sylla did better; for he revenged, and resigned in the height of his sway, red with the slaughter of his foes - the finest instance of glorious contempt of the rascals upon record. Dioclesian did well too; Amurath not amiss, had he become aught except a dervise; Charles the Fifth but so-so; but Napoleon worst of all.'

"Alter 'potent spell' to 'quickening spell:' the first (as Polonius says) 'is a vile phrase,' and means nothing, besides being common-place and Rosa-Matildaish. After the resolution of not publishing, though our Ode is a thing of little length, and less consequence, it will be better altogether that it is anonymous."

All Byron's corrections seem to have flashed upon him; and what improvements they always were! Those fine lines,

⁴⁴ But who would soar the solar height, To set in such a starless night?" stood thus in the original manuscript -"But who would rise in brightest day
To set without one parting ray?"

" The last three stanzas, which Lord Byron had been solicited by Mr. Murray to write, to avoid the stamp-duty then imposed upon publications not exceeding a sheet, were not published with the rest of the poem. 'I don't like them at all, says Lord Byron, 'and they had better be left out. The fact is, I can't do any thing I am asked to do, however gladly I would; and at the end of a week my interest in a composition goes off.'

"In one of Lord Byron's MS. diaries, begun at Ravenna in May 1821, we find the following: 'What shall I write? Another journal? I think not. Any thing that comes uppermost, and call it My Dictionary .- Augustus. I have often been puzzled with his character. Was he a great man? Assuredly; but not one of my great men. I have always looked upon Sylla as the greatest character in history, for laying down his power at the moment when it was ' Too great to keep or to resign,' and thus despising them all. As to the retention of his power by Augustus, the thing was already settled. If he had given it up, the commonwealth was gone; the republic was long past all resuscitation. Had Brutus and Cassius gained the battle of Philippi, it would not have restored the republic. Its days ended with the Gracchi; the rest was a mere struggle of parties. You might as well cure a consumption, or restore a broken egg, as revive a state so long a prey to every uppermost soldier as Rome had long been. As for a despotism, if Augustus could have been sure that all his successors would have been like himself-(I mean not an Octavius, but Augustus)-or Napoleon could have insured the world that none of his successors would have been like himself-the ancient or modern world might have gone on, like the empire of China, in a state of lethargic prosperity. Suppose, for instance, that instead of Tiberius and Caligula, Augustus had been immediately succeeded by Nerva, Trajan, the Antonines, or even by Titus and his father what a difference in our estimate of himself! So far from gaining by the contrast, I think that one half of our dislike arises from his having been heired by Tiberius, and one half of Julius Cæsar's fame from his having had his empire consolidated by Augustus. Suppose that there had been no Octavius, and Tiberius whether hereditary right or popular choice produce the worser sovereigns. The Roman consuls make a goodly show; but then they only reigned for a year, and were under a sort of personal obligation to distinguish themselves. It is still more difficult to say which form of government is the worst-all are so bad. As for democracy, it is the worst of the whole; for what is, in fact, democracy? An aristocracy of blackguards.

"On being reminded by a friend of his recent promise not to write any more for years. 'There was,' replied Lord Byron, 'a mental reservation in my pact with the public, in behalf of anonymes: and, even had there not, the provocation was such as to make it physically impossible to pass over this epoch of triumphant tameness. 'Tis a sad business; and, after all, I shall think higher of rhyme and reason, and very humbly of your heroic people, till Elba becomes a volcano, and sends him out again. I can't think it is all over yet. "A few days after he had put the finishing hand to the Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte, Lord Byron adopted the most extraordinary resolution that perhaps ever entered into the mind of an author of any celebrity. Annoyed at the tone of disparagement in which his assailants, not content with blackening his moral and social character, now affected to speak of his genius, and somewhat mortified, there is reason to believe, by finding that his own friends dreaded the effects of constant publications on his ultimate fame, he came to the determination not only to print no more in future, but to purchase back the whole of his past copyrights, and suppress every line he had ever written. With this view, on the 29th of April, he actually enclosed his publisher a draft for the money. 'For all this,' he said, 'it might be as well to assign some reason: I have none to give, except my own caprice; and I do not consider the circumstance of consequence enough to require explanation.' An appeal, however, from Mr. Murray to his good-nature and considerateness, brought, in eight-and-forty hours, the following reply: 'If your present note is serious, and it really would be inconvenient, there is an end of the matter: tear my draft, and go on as usual. That I was perfectly serious in wishing to suppress all future publication is true; but certainly not to interfere with the convenience of others, and more particularly your own.' The following passages in his Diary depict the state of Lord Byron's mind at this period:-- 'Murray has had a letter from his brother bibliopole of Edinburgh, who says 'he is lucky in having such a poet,'—something as if one was a pack-horse, or 'ass, or any thing that is his;' or like Mrs. Packwood, who replied to some inquiry after the Odes on Razors, Laws, sir, we keeps a poet.' The same illustrious Edinburgh bookseller once sent an order for books, poesy, and cookery, with this agreeable postscript—'The Harold and Cookery are much wanted.' Such is fame! and, after all, quite as good as any other 'life in others' breath.' 'Tis much the same to divide purchasers with Hannah Glasse or Hannah More. —March 17th, Redde the Quarrels of Authors. a new work, by that most entertaining and researching writer, D'Israeli. They seem to be an irritable set, and I wish myself well out of it. 'I'll not march through Coventry with them, that's flat.' What the devil had I to do with scribbling? It is too late to inquire, and all regret is useless. But an' it were to do again, I should write again, I suppose. Such succeeded Julius? and yet it is difficult to say I shall think better of myself if I have sense to stop now. If I have a wife, and that wife has a son, I will bring up mine heir in the most anti-poetical way; make him a lawyer, or a pirate, or any thing: but if he writes too, I shall be sure he is none of mine, and will cut him off with a bank token .- April 19th. I will keep no further journal; and, to prevent me from returning, like a dog, to the vomit of memory, I tear out the remaining leaves of this volume. 'Oh fool! I shall go mad.' These extracts are from the diary of March and April. Before the end of May he had begun the composition of Lara, which has been almost universally considered as the continuation of The Corsair. This poem was published anonymously in the following August, in the same volume with Mr. Rogers' elegant tale of Jacqueline; an unnatural and unintelligible conjunction, which, however, gave rise to some pretty good jokes. 'I believe,' says Lord Byron, in one of his letters, I told you of Larry and Jacquy. A friend of mine_at least a friend of his-was reading said Larry and Jacquy in a Brighton coach. A passenger took up the book, and queried as to the author. The proprietor said 'there were two;' to which the answer of the unknown was, 'Ay, ay, a joint concern, I suppose; summot like Sternhold and Hopkins.' Is not this excellent? I would not have missed the 'vile comparison' to have escaped being the 'Arcades ambo, et cantare

There are many critical remarks affixed, from most of which we entirely dissent. We quote two or three for that very purpose.

" Lord Byron seems to have taken a whimsical pleasure in disappointing, by his second canto, most of the expectations which he had excited by the first. For, without the resuscitation of Sir Ezzelin, Lara's mysterious vision in his antique hall becomes a mere useless piece of lumber, inapplicable to any intelligible purpose :- the character of Medora, whom we had been satisfied to behold very contentedly domesticated in the Pirate's Island, without inquiring whence or why she had emigrated thither, is, by means of some mysterious relation between her and Sir Ezzelin, involved in very disagreeable ambiguity; and, further, the high-minded and generous Conrad, who had preferred death and torture to life and liberty if purchased by a nightly murder, is degraded into a vile and cowardly assassin .- George Ellis.

" Lara, though it has many good passages, is a further proof of the melancholy fact, which is true of all sequels, from the continuation of the Æneid, by one of the famous Italian poets of the middle ages, down to Polly, a sequel to the Beggar's Opera, that 'more last words' may generally be spared without any great detriment to the world .- Bishop Heber.

" Lara has some charms which the Corsair has not. It is more domestic; it calls forth more sympathies with polished society; it is more intellectual; but much less passionate, less vigorous, and less brilliant; it is sometimes even languid, -at any rate, it is more diffuse. Sir E. Brydges.

" Lara, obviously the sequel of the Corsair, maintains in general the same tone of deep interest and lofty feeling; though the disappearance of Medora from the scene deprives it of the enchanting sweetness by which its terrors are there redeemed, and makes the hero, on the whole, less captivating. The character of Lara, too, is rather too laboriously finished; and his nocturnal encounter with the apparihad 'jumped the life' between, and at once is human nature, at least my share of it; though tion is worked up too ostentatiously. There and in many of the moral or general reflections | cautious bard has vainly invested himself." which are interspersed with the narrative.

Jeffrey."

Messrs. Bishop Heber, Sir E. Brydges, and George Ellis, are about as common-place as want of feeling, that only criticism for poetry, can make them; and what sort of connexion the last-mentioned gentleman discovers between Ezzelin and Medora we are utterly at a loss to perceive, there not being a single line which alludes to her existence. Jeffrey's remarks are all the very perfection of good taste; but they want warmth - by warmth we do not mean praise; they are too canonical; they judge too much, as Stephano and Trinculo stole, "by line and level." But for criticism commend us to Sir Walter Scott's: there is the exquisite understanding, which points out the beauty it comprehends—the generous appreciation; there is the great poet entering into and enjoying the merit which he "delighteth to honour." We cannot refrain from quoting a part of some eloquent and true observations.

"We are sometimes, he says, tempted to blame the timidity of those poets, who, possessing powers to arrest the admiration of the public, are yet too much afraid of censure to come frequently forward; and thus defraud themselves of their fame, and the public of the delight which they might afford us. Where success has been unexpectedly, and perhaps undeservedly, obtained by the capricious vote of fashion, it may be well for the adventurer to draw his stake and leave the game, as every succeeding hazard will diminish the chance of his rising a winner. But they cater ill for the public, and give indifferent advice to the poetsupposing him possessed of the highest qualities of his art - who do not advise him to labour while the laurel around his brows yet retains its freshness. Sketches from Lord Byron are more valuable than finished pictures from others; nor are we at all sure that any labour which he might bestow in revisal, would not rather efface than refine those outlines of striking and powerful originality which they exhibit when flung rough from the hand of the master. No one would have wished to condemn Michael Angelo to work upon a single block of marble until he had satisfied, in every point, the petty criticism of that pope who, neglecting the sublime and magnificent character and attitude of his Moses, descended to blame a wrinkle in the fold of the garment. Should it be urged that, in thus stimulating genius to unsparing exertion, we encourage carelessness and hurry in the youthful candidates for literary distinction, we answer, it is not the learner to whom our remarks apply; they refer to him only, who, gifted by nature with the higher power of poetry—an art as difficult as it is enchanting—has made himself master, by application and study, of the mechanical process, and in whom, we believe, frequent exertions upon new works awaken and stimulate that genius which might be cramped and rendered tame by long and minute attention to finish to the highest possible degree any one of the number. If we look at our poetical library, we shall find, generally speaking, the most distinguished poets have been the most voluminous; and that those who, like Gray, limited their productions to a few poems, anxiously and sedulously corrected and revised, have given them a stiff and artificial character, which, far from disarming criticism, has rather embittered its violence; while the Aristarch, like Achilles assailing Hector, meditates dealing the mortal wound through some unguarded crevice of the sup-

[Second Notice: Second Volume.]

In our last we introduced this very lively and characteristic publication to our readers, so sufficiently, that we have now only to make them better acquainted with the second volume, which, like the first, is redolent of legendary lore, anecdote, shooting and fishing exploits, cum multis aliis, and all very entertaining. We have the people and the country placed vividly before us; and almost join in the sights and sports which the author so ably paints.

"Among the human diseases ascribed to supernatural causes, the faragurta is the principal. Conjectures touching its origin are numerous and contradictory, and it is attributed to every thing but the true cause. The faragurta comes on suddenly; a general weakness precedes the attack; the sufferer's strength is prostrated in an instant; he sinks down, and if assistance be not at hand, perishes. Many persons are lost through this disease while crossing the extensive wilds around us, where human relief is generally unattainable. The causes to which in popular belief it is ascribed are many. Some assert, that it is brought on by treading upon a poisonous plant; others, that it is occasioned by fairy influence; while more affirm, that it is produced by passing over the place where a corpse has been laid down. But this mystified disorder is, after all, nothing but exhaustion, consequent upon hunger and fatigue. The lower classes are particularly obnoxious to its attack. They eat but seldom, and at irregular seasons; and commonly labour for many hours before they break their fast. Want of food produces faintness and exhaustion, and a supernatural cause is sought for a simple malady, which is only the natural consequence of dyspepsia and an empty stomach. would imagine that a specific for faragurta would at once point out its origin. Bread, or even a few grains of corn, are believed to cure it instantly; but any kind of food is equally efficacious. 'I have seen,' said my kinsman, many persons attacked with faragurta, and have myself been patient and physician. Some years ago, a fine active boy, called Eminecin, commonly attended me to the moors; and one day he was suddenly taken ill, in the very wildest part of the hills. He lost all power of limb, and lay down upon the heath, unable to proceed a step. We had no grain of any kind to administer, and in this emergency tried that universal panacea, a glass of whisky. After he had swallowed the cordial, the boy rather got worse than better, and we were obliged to carry him to a still-house, at nearly two miles' distance. On our arrival, fortunately for Eminecia, we found the operators collected round a skibb (basket) of potatoes. After eating one or two, the patient was able to join the party, and next morning proceeded stoutly home.

"It is a lamentable fact, that the obligation of a legal oath is here of trifling importance. ases of determined perjury occur every day; and an adjuration upon the Evangelists is considered as being far inferior in solemnity to one upon the priest's vestment. Whether there be any regular formula to be observed in this comparative swearing, I know not. I say comparative; for in Ballycroy, oaths, like adjectives, have three degrees of value: first, that upon ment; and the last, upon the skull. Nothing is more common than to hear a fellow, who has just laid down the book, offer to fortify his doubtful evidence by taking number two. even the vestment is not always conclusive; and the following anecdote will best describe the value of comparative swearing: - Andy Bawn has felt the arrow of 'the villain archer,' and believed, 'fond wretch!' that he was be-loved again. The night of the portmanteau affair will be ever chronicled upon his memory; for while he was under fear and terror at the bridge of Ballyveeney, she, the lady of his love, was at a prinkume at Latrah, performing 'apples for gentlemen' + with another suitor. Nay more, the quondam lover, as was reported, had actually cecisbeo'd Miss Biddy Currigan across the bogs; and dark and dangerous innuendos arose from this imprudent escort. Andy Bawn was, unhappily, a man ' who doubts, but doats; suspects, yet fondly loves.' Alas! what was to be done? Could Miss Currigan become Mrs. Donahoo, after suffering a regular blast, as they call it, in the kingdom of Connaught? Impossible! her character must be cleared, and Andy satisfied. The magistrate was proposed. Well, that was good enough, if it were the identity of a strayed sheep, or the murder of a man; but in a nice case, like Miss Currigan's, it was totally inefficient. 'The vestment would be taken.' Still better; but the world was censorious: and, after all, Biddy Currigan was a giddy girl to cross a couple of miles of moorland, after midnight, with a declared lover, and him hearty (half-drunk); and so thought Andy Bawn. At last the suspected virgin volunteered to 'take the skull,' dispel the fears of her liege lord, and put calumny to the blush for ever. Andy Bawn 'breathed again;' and the otter-killer was directed to provide the necessary articles for the ceremony. A skull was accordingly procured from a neighbouring burying-ground; and Andy's mother, anxious for the honeur of the family, threw into the relic a bunch of keys: for iron, they say, adds desperately to the solemnity of the obligation. The apparatus being paraded, Antony explained, in the mother-tongue, that the sins of the lady or gentleman to whom the skull had once appertained, would be added to Miss Currigan's, if she, Biddy, swore falsely; and Mrs. Donahoo jingled the old iron, and shewed that she was 'awake to time,' and had left nothing on her part undone, that could give effect to the ceremonial. Miss Currigan, with a step and bearing which might silence slander, advanced under the directions of the otter-killer; like 'a maid in the pride of her purity, she devoutly placed her hand upon the skull; and Andy Bawn was made a happy man for ever!"

"I have seen much of snipe-shooting in many parts of Ireland, but I could not have imagined that the number of these exquisite birds could be found within the same space. that one particular marsh which bounds the rabbit-banks produced. Independently of a quantity of detached birds, several wisps sprang wildly, as they always do; and I have no doubt but this fen had been their temporary restingplace after their autumnal migration from the north. We were the more inclined to this opinion from finding many of the birds we killed extremely lean; while others, that sprang singly, were in admirable condition. Achil is a natural resting-place for migratory birds; by the islanders of the immense numbers of woodcocks and snipes which are here found in their transit from a high latitude to our more genial climate. The same remark is made touching the vernal visit of these strangers to this island. After woodcocks have for days vanished from the inland covers, they have been found in flocks on the Achil and Erris highlands, evidently congregating for their passage, and preparing for the attempt. may be easily conceived that, whether the winter stock of snipes and woodcocks be limited or abundant, will mainly depend upon the state of the winds and weather at the period of migration. Hence, when the latter end of October and the succeeding month have continued stormy, with south or south-easterly gales, a lamentable deficiency of game has been invariably observed. That multitudes perish on their passage, or are obliged to change their course, is certain; and the exhausted state in which the small portion of the survivors reach these shores attests how difficult the task must be to effect a landing when opposed by contrary winds and stormy weather.

"With regard to the moral condition of the West, I cannot conscientiously assert that any great improvement will be traced for the last half century. The two great classes, the gentry and peasantry, have undergone a mighty revolution in conduct, manners, and modes of thinking; and yet one will look in vain for commensurate advantages. It is admitted that the former body have changed their generic character altogether. We have the old school stigmatised now for its aristocratic tyranny and petty assumption; and many a modern squire blesses God that he is not as others were who preceded him. And yet our fathers were, I verily believe, wiser in their generation. and better fitted for their own times, than we True, these days were little better than barbarous. Denis Browne, and Dick Martin, and Bowes Daly, and many a far-famed name of minor note, were then in all their glory, and they lived, it must be acknowledged, in very curious times. In those days, the qualifica tions of a representative were determined by wager of battle, and a rival for senatorial fame was probably requested by the old member to provide his coffin before he addressed the county. Doctors rode on horseback over the country in cauliflower-wigs and cocked-hats; and if they differed about a dose or a decoction. referred the dispute to mortal arbitrament. In these happy times, a client would shoot his counsellor if he lost a cause—the suitor sought his mistress at pistol-point; and there was but one universal panacea for every known evil, one grand remedy for all injuries and insults. It was then, indeed, a bustling world. Men fought often, drank deep, and played high; ran in debt, as a matter of course; scattered fairs and markets at their good pleasure; put tenants in the stocks ad libitum; and cared no more for the liberty of the subject than they did for the king's writ. Yet were they merry times. Under all these desperate oppressions. the tenants throve and the peasantry were comfortable. Every village could point out its rich man _ every cabin had food sufficient for its occupants. When the rent was required, it was ready; and though a man was sometimes in the guard-house, his cow was rarely in the pound. Tempora mutantur! Who dare now Who put my man i'the stocks?' would be hallooed from Dingle to Cape Clear. Doubtin about the same proportion that freedom is extended. There was one class of persons who, in these old-world times were conspicuously troublesome, who have since then fortunately disappeared. These were a nominal description of gentry, the proprietors of little properties called fodeeins, who continued the names and barbarisms of their progenitors. Without industry, without education, they arrogated a certain place in society, and idly imitated the wealthier in their vices. Poverty and distress were natural results, and desperate means were used to keep up appearances. The wretched serfs, whom they called their tenants, were ground to powder, till, happily for society, the fodecins passed into other hands, and the name and place ceased to be remembered. The ivied walls, and numerous and slender chimneys one sees in passing through this country, will in nine out of ten cases point a moral of this sort. In times like those of forty years ago, this extinct tribe were, from the peculiar temper and formation of society, occasionally a sad nuisance. The lord of a fodeein, like Captain Mac Turk, was ' precisely that sort of person who is ready to fight with any one; whom no one can find an apology for declining to fight with: in fighting with whom considerable danger is incurred; and lastly, through fighting with whom, no éclat or credit could redound to the antagonist.' Hence, generally, the large proprietors saw this class sink by degrees without an attempt to uphold them; and the fodeein, to the great joy of the unhappy devils who farmed it, was appended by general consent to the next estate. Many examples of dangerous and illegal authority, as usurped and exercised by the aristocracy within the last half century, are on record, that would appear mere romance to a stranger. One of the Fitzgerald family was probably more remarkable than any person of his times. He was the terror of the upper classes; and to such as arrogated the privileges of the aristocracy, without, as he opined, a pre-scriptive right, he was the very devil. If a man aspired to become a duellist, or even joined the hounds without being of the proper caste, George Robert would flog him from the field without ceremony. He actually for years maintained an armed banditti, imprisoned his own father, took off persons who were obnoxious; and when he was hanged-and, fortunately for society, this eventually occurred-it required a grand cavalry and artillery movement from Athlone to effect it. Denis Browne was an autocrat of another description; a useful, blundering bear, who did all as religiously in the king's name, as ever Mussulman in that of the prophet. He did much good and some mischief imprisoned and transported as he pleased and the peasantry to this day will tell you, that he could hang any one whom he disliked. Yet both these men were favourites with their tenantry, and under them their dependants prospered and waxed wealthy.

more for the liberty of the subject than they like tenants throve and the peasantry were the tenants throve and the peasantry were monortable. Every village could point out its its occupants. When the rent was required, it was ready; and though a man was sometimes in the guard-house, his cow was rarely in the pound. Tempora mutantur! Who dare now infringe upon the liberty of the subject? Who put my man i'the stocks?' would be hallooed from Dingle to Cape Clear. Doubtless, etil rights are now most scrupulously rents, have ruined this wild district, and reduced the mings of the subject and hence I can well believe the account given protected; but I suspect that food is abridged its peasantry, with few exceptions, to abject by the islanders of the immense numbers of in about the same proportion that freedom is wretchedness and want."

Self-Guidance: a Novel. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Bentley.

This promises to be a very interesting story, written with much feminine feeling and tact, and has the now unusual merit of not being confined to a particular set, and giving us the airs and graces of what is called fashionable life second-hand. A brief extract can furnish no idea of a connected and serious narrative; we shall therefore content ourselves with one of the lively sketches of character that enliven the sentiment, which is the prevailing characteristic of the work.

"Mr. and Mrs. Musgrove had, some ten years back, married for love, and for nothing else, for they were poor; their friends objected, and for three whole years, with the prospect of as many more years in addition, they lived and throve upon love, and were happy and content. A relation died in India; it was matter at first more of surprise than actual enjoyment, when Mr. Musgrove found himself his heir, and a man of wealth. He began at length to understand and appreciate his good fortune: so did his lady; and it was then that love took flight, offended at his rival wealth, and was never after mentioned or missed by the prosperous pair. They hurried into that sea of smoke which is so well described from the summit of Highgate-hill; and there they bought, and talked, and looked, and thought, not of each other, but of every other thing the smoke contained. For a short time, Mr. Musgrove had a decided advantage over his wife in their separate pursuits: he had lived in London before, had many acquaintance, was a member of White's; whilst she was a mere novice, had all to learn, was unknowing and unknown. For a moment, a little moment, she regretted the obscurity she had lost, and with it the attentions of her husband; more particularly when she saw him in the morning parading the streets with hosts of friends, and every evening had him carried from her society by invitations abroad, in which she was not included. Mrs. Musgrove was not, however, a woman to despair; she was pretty, smart, and clever. At a ball given at —— House, she appeared, and was seen; being seen, she was admired; and her conversation proving her wit equal to her beauty, she was, in a moment, the fashion; and, by the end of the season, Mr. Musgrove thought he had heard quite enough of the pearl he possessed, and of the glory of being the lord and master of the most charming woman in London. 'The rage will pass, thought Mr. Musgrove, with something of a groan; but the rage did not pass; and though the judicious world left off considering Mr. Musgrove as a partner in his wife's success, they did not at all leave off considering her as a model of beauty, taste, and wit. At the moment of her meeting the Hamiltons at Ashleigh Park, she was at the pinnacle of her glory, and the greatest flirt going. Mr. Musgrove looked like a gentleman, spoke like a gentleman, but his wife fairly eclipsed him; so that, in her presence, his part was wholly and entirely subordinate. He had his consolation in the society which clubs afforded. There female influence is banished; the lords of the creation may there exercise their lordly dominion, without the gaudy insects, who, every where else, are trying to gain possession of the country. At clubs, therefore, he could play his rubber, cut his joke, and assert his opinion in peace. May such resorts long exist for the benefit of such as Mr. land, Esq. of Blaze Castle, in the county of Mrs. Musgrove was short, her figure light and airy; her beautiful teeth were ever displayed in smiles, in which expression her eyes, bright and sparkling, joined: rouge, perhaps, assisted her complexion; but, be this as it may, the tout ensemble was good. Flirting was the object, pleasure, and business of her life: to gain the attentions she required, she would assume any character, any form, or take any trouble.

To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run, To spend, to give, to want, to be undone.

Her present object was Colonel Lennox, one of the party at Ashleigh Park. This was a young man of noble birth and noble exterior, small fortune, expensive habits, and great fashion. His resolve had long been to sacrifice some day at the shrine of wealth by marriage; but en attendant a period which he daily put off, and daily found more requisite, he was the cecisbeo of any lady of decided fashion, who chose to take the trouble of making advances to him. Mrs. Musgrove having, therefore, laid the train, he fell instantly into the most spirited flirtation possible; in the full tide of which affair the Hamiltons reached Ashleigh Park, and were to be either scandalised or amused as their inclination led them. The Hamiltons were not people, however, to trouble themselves about the affairs of their neighbours, and would hardly have noticed the mutual attentions of Colonel Lennox and Mrs. Musgrove, but for the astonishment of a country squire, his wife and daughter—Lord Ashleigh's guests of course—who had eyes to see, ears to hear, and tongues to tell, and were in a perpetual state of irritation and astonishment at Mr. Musgrove's blindness, Lord and Lady Ashleigh's indifference, the Colonel and Mrs. Musgrove's impudence, and the little discouragement they met with from any of the party. One day the father of the family seriously informed Mrs. Hamilton that, if a convenient opportunity should occur, he should think it his duty as a magistrate, a family man, a good subject, and one of the society for the suppression of vice, to inform Mr. Musgrove of the necessity of admonishing his wife upon her conduct. The feelings of this family it was not difficult to penetrate, and the pleasure of surprising them gave additional zest to Mrs. Musgrove's flirtation. Lady Ashleigh, who hated all those she called indi genous, viewed with infinite delight an opportunity of Ashleigh becoming odious to them. without her being the offending party; so secretly gave all her encouragement to her friend's desire to astonish the weak minds of the natives. The scheme succeeded to admiration; and when the family left Ashleigh, it was with the full conviction of one and all being subpænaed to give evidence of the levity of Mrs. Musgrove's conduct, in a court of justice. The father actually drew up an extremely voluminous statement, which might have equally been considered a moral essay, to be delivered upon the important occasion of Musgrove v. Lennox. It was just finished, and, after many revisions, and much applause from his wife and for its public display, when, in the Morning Post, appeared the following paragraph:

" Marriage in High Life. By special license, on Thursday evening last, at the resisidence of the bride's mother, in Cumberland Place, the Honourable Colonel Lennox, youngest son of the late Lord Hazleford, to the beautiful and accomplished Miss Morland, only Denbigh, and of Morlands, in Gloucestershire. After the ceremony the happy pair left London for the beautiful villa of Lady Jane Morland, the lovely bride's mother, at Twickenham, there to spend the honey-moon!"

The time is laid some fifteen years back.

THE DRAMA.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee, &c. &c. [Third Notice.]

As we purpose, in our next, to go a little into the statistics of the theatres, we shall not now broach any question which requires to be discussed; but content ourselves (having this week very little room to spare) with transcribing some portions of the very strong evidenceespecially as to copyrights—given by the able author of "Black-eyed Susan," the "Rent-Day," and other popular original pieces - Mr. Jerrold.

"Have you any suggestions to offer to the committee with reference to the copyrights of authors? Do you think any improvements could be made in the law as respects authors? I think certainly there ought to be some penalty inflicted upon any manager who represents any drama without the author's consent. - How would you have that penalty to be recovered? theatres in the metropolis in that case? I think, in the aggregate, I might obtain a great deal by receiving a small sum from each theatre. year, and after its production.—In different theatres? Yes; 150 nights at the Surrey, I 100 nights at the Pavilion; 30 nights at Covent Garden theatre, and at other houses, as the West London and the Olympic, a few nights. For that piece I received altogether as much as Mr. T. P. Cooke has informed the committee he received for six nights' acting at Covent Garden theatre. —Sixty pounds? Yes. -That was from the first theatre? Yes. -Do you suppose if the other theatres had had to remunerate you, they would have acted it? Certainly. It would have amounted to a great sum to me if it had been played even on the humble terms of 5s. a-night throughout the country. — Was it published? It was. — Then the Surrey Theatre has lost all control over it? Yes; but I could have had no control over it, if it had not been published .- Did you receive any thing from the publisher? I received 10/ for the copyright, which, with 50%. I received from the theatre, makes the 601. I only received 601. altogether. If it had not been published I should not have received more money, as in the instance of the Rent-Day. That piece was played in the country a fortnight after it was produced at Drury Lane; and I have a a copy of the piece, had not he before paid 21. for it to some stranger. Some stranger? Yes: I have no doubt where he got it from. There is an agency office where they are obtained.— What agency office? Mr. Kenneth, at the corner of Bow Street, will supply any gentleman with any manuscript on the lowest terms. -How does he procure them: is it by a shorthand writer in the theatre? He steals them somehow; he has no right to them. - This is previous to publication? Previous to publication .- It must be done by a short-hand writer? I do not know how it is done. I offered to sell correct copies of my compositions for 5l., because an author receives a double injury. In the first place, they are not paid for their pieces; and, in the next place, they are represented by the skeletons of their dramas; so that it was emphatically said by the sufferer, the author was not only robbed, but murdered. — You could have procured an injunction? If I had gone into Chancery.—You consulted no lawyer? No; I understood generally that was the only means of obtaining redress.—Do you consider the remuneration to dramatic authors is not sufficient to attract first-rate talent to that branch of composition? Certainly not, when periodical writing and novels are so highly paid for. A gentleman will get 1000l. for a novel, and Mr. Sheridan Knowles only got 400l. for the Hunchback. - Did you apply to Covent I am not sufficiently versed in forms of law to Garden for additional remuneration for Blackstate that, but I should imagine before a magis-eved Susan? I did; and I received a letter trate. Would not it be a difficult question to from Mr. Bartley, the manager, in which he put to a magistrate, whether the pieces were expressed something more than surprise at the the same, as in the case of translations, where request, and said the representation of that two authors have translated the same French piece at Covent Garden theatre had done me a drama, how could a magistrate be enabled to great deal of good. I have not yet discovered decide upon the identity? I do not think you that.—In point of reputation, he meant? The would have so many translations then.—Why reputation I acquired did not give me sufficient do you think not so many? Because it would influence to get a piece brought out the next be worth the while of men of original talent to season at Covent Garden. — But certainly the devote their energies to the theatres. - Do you reputation of being the author of a piece which think you should obtain much remuneration had been played so many nights would do you from the provincial theatres, or from the other good? Not at Covent Garden. It was played thirty nights there, and Mr. Cooke left Covent Garden to play at the Surrey .- On what stage did it appear to the most advantage? On the I will instance Black-eyed Susan, which was Surrey, certainly; in fact, it was infinitely played 400 nights in the course of the first better played at the Surrey than Covent Garden. What did you receive for the Rent-Day at Drury Lane? 1501. - How many nights has it think; perhaps 100 nights at Sadler's Wells; been acted? I am not certain, for I was out 100 nights at the Pavilion; 30 nights at of town towards the close: I believe either forty-three or forty-four.—Did you receive the 150l. at the close? On the twenty-fifth night. -Have you considered at all what legislative provision could be made, which would benefit authors in that respect? I think a very heavy penalty upon any manager who should represent a piece without the author's consent. -That penalty to be obtained by summary proceedings before a magistrate? Yes .- Would it not be difficult to prove the identity of a piece, in consequence of alterations? Of course it must be considered according to the spirit, and not to the letter of the piece .- Would it not puzzle some country managers to decide whether it was a plagiary or not? Some country managers might; but I think in large towns it could be done very well. I do not think perhaps the author could be enabled to get any money for the copy of the piece if it was acted at the greatest room in the town, by people who may be there one night and gone another; but in circuits, like the Liverpool, Norwich, and York circuits, he would; also at the Dublin theatre, and in Scotland .- Are not all those beautiful and accomplished Miss Morland, only letter in my pocket in which the manager said provincial theatres, Manchester and York, dedaughter and heiress of the late Ralph Morland, he would very willingly have given me 51 for pressed at present? I believe they are, from political excitement and the general depression | of the times; I believe they are worse in the manufacturing districts. — Do you mean that depression has only originated since the late political excitement? I think since the peace every thing has been depressed to some extent. -Do you think it has arisen from any religious scruples or dislike to theatrical performances? Yes: I think sectarianism has done much towards it.-Are strolling players quite extinct now? No. they are not .- Are there as many of them as there used to be? I do not think there are so many as when Mr. Munden played in a barn .- Do you think strolling pays them; do you think they make any money? I believe they are a very temperate race, and do with a little...Do you think they are enabled ever to lay by any money? No, I do not think they are; they may be ultimately. It is only when they come here they are enabled to lay by. -Not in the country? No, I think not. - You would have a new play, or any thing that was written, put upon the same footing as a novel or any other composition? Precisely. - The author of a novel has only a right of action. which would be worth nothing to you? That would be something .- You would have it regularly entered at Stationers' Hall? Yes, that would be something; because there is no doubt authors would make common cause with one another to preserve their copyrights; it would be worth their while .- I believe in France the copyright remains in the heirs of the author? I believe it does .- Do you think that would be advisable? I would have it for a certain time. my twenty-eight years; so that if a man wrote plays, he should west his capital in his works, and leave them to his children for publication. The copyright of any work is only for twenty-eight years? Yes.—You think that would be something? Yes, I think that would be a great deal; and by those means you would induce men of original talent to write for the stage; at present the intellect of the country is almost excluded from the stage.-What is the general price of the copyright of a play for publication? Since translation, the price has gone down to nothing. I believe Mr. Holcroft got 300% or 400%; I may be in error, but it was a great sum, 3001. I believe, for the copyright of the Road to Ruin; and I know Mr. Sheridan Knowles was able to get scarcely any thing for the Hunchback .- There surely must be a considerable sale of a successful play in the lobbies of the theatres? No, there is not since translation. The public have ceased to look upon Plays as part of the literature of the country."

"Have you any general observations to make with regard to the stage? I think that actors and authors ought to have the self-same privileges which are enjoyed by the professors of any other art, and which at present they have not. I think there is a great distinction between an author or an actor and a painter. If a painter produce a picture, and from intrigue or misjudgment, or, to take a more liberal illustration, if there be not room enough to hang that picture in an exhibition-room, the painter is not compelled to roll his picture up and take it home, but he may exhibit it in Bond Street, or any other part of the metropolis; but an author or an actor could not do that, or, if they do it, they are told they do it in defiance of the law. — The field is not large enough? No .- According to law? Yes; I think it is monstrous, a manager should say to an author or an actor, You shall not write or peak within twenty miles of London, for that is the sovereignty which is contended for by the proprietors of Covent Garden; so that he must Earth's shadow.

open his mouth.

"Was Black-eved Susan licensed? No: it was sent to the licenser from Covent Garden. -Was any alteration made in it? Yes; some passages were ordered to be omitted .- Will you 2 z Tauri. state what they were? The boatswain has to say, in speaking of William, 'He plays the fiddle like an angel.' He struck that out .- Does the actor leave out that passage always in Covent Garden? I believe not .- You think the actor uses the expression although it is struck out? I never saw it but once at Covent Garden, and I think he used that expression. -Do you think the Drama ought to be put under the censorship of the Lord Chamberlain? No; I think you might as well have a censor-ship of the press.—Will you state your objection to the control of an examiner? I think it is apt to be exercised very capriciously... Do you know of any instance? Yes, one of my own, at Drury Lane. I had a piece called the Bride of Ludgate, in which Charles the Second figured as the hero, and he was disguised as a priest, come to marry a young couple. Mr. Colman said he thought, in the present state of the bishops, he ought not to come as a priest, but I must make him a proctor. I sacrificed the worth of something, which was very worthless perhaps; but I was obliged to submit to that alteration, which I thought very capricious and absurd."

* Reply to a Correspondent.—The diameters of the Sun and Moon, or, indeed, of any celestial body that exhibits a circular disc, are conceived to be divided into twelve equal parts called digits or degrees, each of these being subdivided into sixty equal parts called minutes, &c. This scale, when applied to a solar eclipse, expresses the quantity of the Sun's disc that is covered: when applied to the phases of the Moon and Venus, it indicates the proportion of their discs that is defective of light, which, in either case, never exceeds twelve digits. In lunar eclipses the case is different: the Moon's diameter may be considered as a measure of that portion of the Earth's shadow which it traverses when eclipsed, the breadth of the Moon: all that is eclipsed beyond twelve digits or degrees indicates the quantity of the shadow more than the Moon's diameter, measured from that edge to which the Moon is nearest in the middle of the eclipse. ld_the Earth in the plane of Saturn's ring. 29d 15h_Saturn in conjunction with β Virginis. 25d Uranus stationary near , Capricorni.

Disappearance and Re-appearance of Saturn's Ring.

The principal phenomena observed in the circular ring which surrounds the orb of Saturn arise from its being seen in an oblique direction, consequently assuming an elliptic figure, varying in appearance according to the position of the planet in its orbit. When the longitude of Saturn is about 170° or 350° (the nodes or places of intersection of the ring and ecliptic), the ring vanishes, and the planet appears like the others, with merely a circular disc. When the longitude is 80° or 260°, the eye then being elevated 28° 39′ 54″ above the plane of the ring, it appears as an ellipse, of which the ratio of the minor to the major axis is as 498 to 1000. The disappearances and re-appearances of the ring occur twice in one periodic revolution of the planet (29, 174d 5h 16m 320-22), or once in fifteen years, but frequently under circumstances very different. When the plane of the ring passes through the Sun, or the Earth, or between the Sun and the Earth, the ring ceases to be seen: in the first instance, the Sun shines only upon the edge of the ring, which is too thin to reflect sufficient light to render it visible; in the second case, the edge only being turned towards the Earth, it is not visible for the same reason; and, in the third case, the dark plane being exposed, and the edge being the only luminous part which is towards the Earth, it is invisible on the same account as before; for it can only be seen when the Earth and Sun are sufficiently elevated above its plane - the Sun to illumine it, and the Earth to perceive the reflected rays. The ring may be visible when the Sun is elevated 3' above its plane, or three days before its plane passes through the Sun; and when the Earth is elevated 2' 20" above the plane, or one day from the Earth passing it. The ring has been perceived when invisible to common observation, either from the reflection of the edge, or from the dark side being enlightened by the reflection of the globe of Saturn - a phenomenon similar to the lumière cendrée of our Moon.

The ring last disappeared in March 1819.

The planet was then in its ascending node: the southern side of the plane shortly after became visible as an extremely narrow oval, which attained its greatest expansion in November 1825; since that time it has been gradually contracting, is now close to its descending node, and will soon disappear under the following cir-Tomorrow (September 30d 6h) cumstances. the Earth will be in the plane of the ring, which will disappear for the reasons previously stated. The Sun will continue shining on the southern side, though very obliquely, until the following December 1d 20h, when the edge of the solar disc will, to an observer on the globe of Saturn, touch the southern plane, and emerge above the northern, on which it will continue gaining until 3^d 13^h, when the plane of the ring will pass through the Sun's centre. ring will then be very unfavourably circumstanced for observation, even with powerful instruments, the Sun's rays only sliding along each side of the plane, which being only \(\frac{1}{2} \) in thickness, the edge will reflect so little light as to render it imperceptible. 8d 9h - the Sun's diameter will have entirely emerged above the northern plane, occupying 3d 13h from its first appearance till the whole diameter had risen to that side of the ring. The Earth at this time will see it as a very narrow ellipse, gradually expanding till January 1^d, 1833, when it will again begin to contract until the following April 28^d 4^h. The Earth, on that day, will be a second time in the plane of the ring, passing from the northern to the southern side, which, not being enlightened by the Sun, will continue imperceptible till the ensuing June 10d 19h, when the Earth will be a third time in the plane of the ring, passing from the southern to the northern side, which will then continue expanding, with a little variation, till July 1838, at which time the oval will appear most open, again to contract and vanish in Dec. 1784.

It is comparatively easy to predict the period when the plane of the ring passes through the Sun's centre; but it requires a more elaborate computation to point out the times when it passes through the Earth, whose annual motion imparts an intricacy to its determination. In the same year there may be two disappearances and two re-appearances; the planet may be apparently destitute of its ansæ for only a month; but if occurring when Saturn is stationary or retrograde, they would remain invisible about nine months. The nature of the recurrence of the phenomena, as far as the Earth is concerned, is somewhat similar to the return of the transits of the inferior planets Mercury and Venus, in which a certain number of their revolutions correspond to an exact number of the Earth's before a transit can happen. With reference to Saturn, it is found that in 59 years of our planet there are nearly two complete revolutions of Saturn, and that in 324 sidereal years there is a closer approximation to exactness, Saturn in this period completing eleven revolutions, and the two bodies, the Earth and the planet, are brought again into the position in which they were at its commencement. Hence, in the year 1891, the phenomena will not be very dissimilar to those ensuing in the present and following year; but in the year 2156 there will be a much closer approximation.

The following are some of the epochs at which these disappearances and re-appearances have been observed: 1715, February 5d, reappeared; 1730, November 10d, disappeared; appeared; 1700, November 10., anappeared; 1744, July 23d, disappeared; 1760, April 25d, re-appeared; 1774, January 9d, re-appeared; 1789, October 1d, disappeared; 1803, June 18d, disappeared; 1819, March 1d, disappeared.

From the above it is evident that, though these changes happen twice in the planet's revolution, the epochs do not occur at regular intervals. It appears that between 1715 and 1730 there is 15 years 9 months; but between 1730 and 1744 there is only 13 years 8 months: a similar difference is also observable in the other intervals. This inequality arises from the eccentricity of the orbit of Saturn; for if a plane were drawn through the Sun's centre, and perpendicular to the plane of the ring, it would determine the nodes of the orbit, and divide it into two unequal parts, the one con-taining the perihelion and the other the aphelion of the planet. Accordingly, it is known that Saturn was in aphelion (moving then slowest) between 1715 and 1730, and in perihelion (moving then swiftest) between 1730 and 1744.

Some of the most interesting discoveries relative to the structure of the ring have been made about the period of its disappearance. Sometimes one ansa has disappeared, and then the other; at other seasons the extreme parts of the arms seem detached from the planet; which appearances may be accounted for from a curvature in the plane combined with its rotation. From protuberant lucid points, which seem to adhere to the ring, it is ascertained that it performs a revolution round the planet in the same direction as the satellites, from west to east, in a period of 10h 29m 16 8, about an axis perpendicular to its plane, which axis is also coincident with that of the globe of Saturn; consequently the plane of the ring is everywhere vertical to the equatorial regions of the planet. It is very remarkable, that this period of revolution is that in which, according to the third law of Kepler, a satellite would revolve at the distance of the middle of the ring. This circumstance identifies the ring (which may be considered as a satellite) with the planetary train, and proves that the same physical cause which maintains their revolutions, sustains the ring in its circulation round the central orb. The inequalities in the ring have been supposed to be necessary for preserving its equilibrium; for if it were a perfectly uniform body, it would the orb.

It has long been known that the ring is divided into two parts, concentric to each other; in fact, two rings, both of which are brighter than the orb, and the outer ring brighter than the inner. Later observations seem to confirm that which was formerly only suspected - that the exterior ring consists of a series of rings, one within the other, over which a variable atmosphere hovers, sometimes concealing the lines of separation, and causing that which is termed the exterior ring to appear perfectly undivided and compact. The orb is not exactly in the centre of this system of rings, being nearer to the eastern than to the western side.

A very interesting phenomenon has been observed when the ring has appeared as a slender line of light—the satellites have been perceived entering on this line, and traced along it to the orb of the planet, like beautiful beads on a delicate silver thread. This proves, either that the diameters of the satellites exceed the thickness of the ring, or that an atmosphere is diffused on each side, which, by a species of double refraction, at the same time elevates and depresses them, so as to cause them to be perceived above and below the line.

The Comet of Biela.

Sir John Herschel last Monday morning early; its position then was about one degree and a half south-west of / Aurigæ, which corresponds with the track pointed out in former Nos. of the Literary Gasette. It is, however, at present too distant and faint to be visible, excepting with very superior instruments.

On the following Monday (October 1st), it will rise about eight in the evening, nearly in a line with / Auriga and / Geminorum, five degrees west of the latter star, to which it will pass very close on the 4th day. The comet will be nearest to the earth about the 22d day, and pass its perihelion on the 27th November.

J. T. BARKER.

Letter to the President of the Academy of Sciences, from Baron Alex. von Humboldt.

Paris, Sept. 20.

SIR,-The generous interest which the Institute has always manifested whenever the name of my friend and fellow-traveller, M. Bonpland, has been mentioned in its sittings, and the active kindness with which the Academy of Sciences has taken part in the fruitless attempts that have been made to obtain his deliverance, make it my duty to address these lines to you. More than a year had elapsed since the receipt of the first news of the arrival of M. Bonpland in the Provincia de las Missiones. None of his letters had reached Europe; and my uneasiness was shared by the relations of M. Bonpland, who reside at La Rochelle. At length I have been so happy as to receive direct intelligence, through the kindness of Baron Delessert. A letter from M. Bonpland, dated Buenos Ayres, May 7th, 1832, informs me that some lines which I wrote to him in July, last year, reached him in January, 1832, during his stay at Corrientes, situated near the conflux of the rivers Parana and Paraguay. "I have been hindered," he says, "in all the plans which I formed when I left France. An evil star has attended me for fifteen years: I flatter myself that I shall be more fortunate now that I have quitted Paraguay. Restored to my friends, again yield to the slightest attraction, which might able to communicate with civilisation and Euultimately precipitate it on to the surface of rope, I have resumed my ancient studies in natural history with the greatest activity, that I may be able to return as soon as possible to my country. My collections of Paraguay and the Portuguese ought to have arrived at Buenos Ayres in the month of March: I expect their arrival with impatience (which cannot be long delayed), and will immediately send them to Europe, addressed to the Minister for Foreign Affairs at Paris, with a request to have the cases delivered to the Museum of Natural History. The Jardin des Plantes will receive not only what I have recently collected, but what herbaria I have saved at Corrientes and Buenos Ayres, and, in particular, my general her-barium, and the geological series of the course of our journey. I shall add to this collection the rocks which I have lately obtained, as well as those which, in a few days, I may procure in the excursions which I shall make on Monte Video, Maldonado, and Cabo Santa Maria. am here in the house of the Chevalier de Angelis, a Neapolitan, who has received me with the greatest hospitality, and whom you formerly saw at Paris, in the circle of Countess Orloff. I find every facility for forwarding my collections to France. The fertility of the soil, and the luxuriance of the vegetation in the Portuguese missions are such, that I feel myself bound to return to them. I think that even This anxiously expected visitor was seen by those who desire my speedy return to Europe

ney. It would be cruel to come away without enriching botany with so many remarkable productions. My collections will contain two new species of convolvulus, the roots of which have all the good qualities of the orchis morio. I hope also that the School of Medicine will make some trials of the use of those very bitter barks belonging to three new species of a genus which belongs to the family of the quassia simarouba. These barks have a taste of sulphate of quinine, and act in the most beneficial manner in dysenteries and other similar complaints. If I could receive, while I am here, some information respecting the efficacy of these barka, as observed at Paris, I would endeavour, before my departure, to make arrangements to supply our hospitals."

Such are the particulars which I have thought it my duty to extract from M. Bonpland's letter, which make me regret other letters, written before, and which are probably lost. I take this opportunity of communicating to the Academy a geological fact, which has been known to us here only a few days, and which is connected with other facts observed in Europe and in the interior of Asia. M. de Seckendorf has found in the Harz (Valley of Radau), in a quarry near the road leading to Harsburg, fragments of grauwacke (with petrification) embedded in granite. M. Hartmann, translator of Lyell's Geology, has just confirmed the truth of this observation, and announces that he will soon send specimens.

Berin, Aug. 26th, 1832.
P.S. Just as I am closing my letter, I receive the important news that Encke's comet (of the short period of three years three-tenths), was observed at Buenos Ayres at the beginning of June, 1832. M. Encke has been informed by M. Olbers, that a member of the Typographic Bureau of Buenos Ayres, M. Massoti (perhaps the same who was formerly at the observatory at Milan, and also had published observations on the planetary orbits) observed the comet on the 2d of June, 1832, at Buenos Ayres, 5° 30' civil time, in 56° 37′ 5″ right ascension, in 11° 20′ 1″ south declination; which appears not to differ more than about two minutes from M. Encke's calculations for the comet with the short period observed by him.

Works of Lord Byron. Vol. VII. Murray. Were we called upon to bear testimony to the brilliance of the sun on the 26th day of September, on which we are writing, we should have no difficulty in saying that it is insurpassably splendid. It is much the same with re-ference to the plates in the volume before us-With their localities we have nothing to do, except to observe that, interesting in themselves, they are rendered infinitely more so by their connexion with the thoughts and feelings of the great poet whose immortal productions they illustrate; but with respect to their execution, it is our duty to declare, that in our opinion it was never exceeded. Witness "The Cape of Colona," in which the distant and sunny haze, with the few light clouds flickering across it, is so wonderfully expressed, that it would not be more difficult to point out in nature where the gentle gradation blends itself with pure ether: witness " Patras," the lines forming the inimitably flat sky of which are so curiously delicate and regular as to give the

In short, there is not one of these exquisite plates in which the Findens have not done ample justice to the subjects so finely prepared for them by Messrs. Turner, Stanfield, W. Westall, Cattermole, and Purser. There is also an interesting head of "Margarita Cogni," engraved by T. H. Ryall, from a picture painted at the request of Lord Byron by poor Harlow.

> The Illustrations of the Friendship's Offering have reached us only on Friday morning, so that we can do no more than speak of them from a hurried glance. That glance, however, satisfies us that they are very varied, well chosen, and interesting; combining portrait, landscape, and fancy subjects of great beauty, and executed in a superior style.

The Brig Black Joke engaging the Spanish Slave Brig Marenerito, Bight of Biafra, April 26, 1831. On stone, by G. P. Reinagle. Dickinson.

THIS Black Joke is an odd affair, of which we cannot make much out. Two very black ships, with very black sails and very black crews, are firing away at each other like furious blackguards; and what with the smoke, and the clouds, and the sea, we should be unable to tell how the fight was going, but that the in-scription below informs us that the Slaver was beaten by the Black Joke.

BIOGRAPHY.

DEATH OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

On Friday last, the 21st of September, 1832, at Abbotsford, departed all that was mortal of this celebrated man, who had only attained the limited period of sixty-one years of age. The leading incidents of his life are too familiar to the world to require recapitulation. Born in 1771, he was above thirty years old before any publication of his gave note of the rich mine of poetry and imaginative literature which perfect notion of a wash of colour, and to be had lain so long unobserved, if not uncultiincapable of detection without the aid of a vated,—most likely uncultivated with any spemagnifier: witness "The Temple of Jupiter cific design, though the foundations for future Olympius," in which the tender air tints of the fame were deeply and widely spread. The Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border opened the wondrous shaft, and for more than the quarter of a century, the production of the splendid treasures below appeared in inexhaustible abundance and incalculable value. The Lay of the Last Minstrel, Marmion, the Lady of the Lake, the Vision of Don Roderick, Rokeby, the Lord of the Isles, were all given to the world within the time which the Horatian rule prescribes for a single work; and these, in turn, were followed by the equally fertile flow of the Waverley novels, which have made an epoch in the literature of our day, and will be the delight of mankind for generations to come. The labours of the pen were also known to Sir Walter Scott, who in the midst of these extraordinary emanations of genius, performed the drudgery of editing Dryden and Swift, and of writing the history of Napoleon; besides innumerable contributions to periodicals, dramas, and essays in every species of composition.

His epistolary correspondence was also very extensive; and we are informed that, together with the diary which he regularly kept, a selection of his letters, &c. will form not less than ten volumes of the highest interest. From his son-in-law, Mr. Lockhart, the public will expect the completion of this duty; and whether we look to his near relationship, his information, or his congenial talent, we must feel that it could not devolve upon a more competent individual.

Of Sir Walter Scott's legal and official career, or of his pecuniary circumstances, it is not for us to speak; and we congratulate ourselves that the touching strain which we now annex from the pen of L. E. L. enables us to leave these matters of worldly record to others :-

Our sky has lost another star, The earth has claimed its own, And into dread eternity A glorious one is gone. He who could give departed things So much of light and breath, He is himself now with the past-Gone forth from life to death.

It is a most unblessed grave That has no mourner near; The meanest turf the wild flowers hide Has some familiar tear: But kindred sorrow is forgot Amid the general gloom; Grief is religion felt for him Whose temple is his tomb.

Thou of the future and the past, How shall we honour thee? Shall we build up a pyramid Amid the pathless sea? Shall we bring red gold from the east, And marble from the west, And carved porphyry, that the fane Be worthy of its guest?

Or shall we seek thy native land, And choose some ancient hill, To be thy statue, finely wrought With all the sculptor's skill? Methinks, as there are common signs To every common wo, That we should do some mighty thing? To mark who lies below.

But this is folly: thou needst not The sculpture or the shrine: The heart is the sole monument For memories like thine. The pyramids in Egypt rose To mark some monarch's fame; Imperishable is the tomb. But what the founder's name?

Small need for tribute unto thee,
To let the fancy roam—
To thee, who hast by many a hearth
An altar and a home:
Each little bookshelf where thy works
Are carefully enshrined,
There is thy trophy, there is left
Thy heritage of mind.

How many such delightful hours
Rise on our saddened mood,
When we have owed to thee and thine
The charm of solitude!
How eagerly we caught the book!
How earnestly we read!
How actual seemed the living scenes
Thy vivid colours spread!

And not to one dominion bound
Has been thy varied power;
In many a distant scene enjoyed—
In many a distant hour.
In childhood turning from its play,
In manhood, youth, and age,
All bent beneath the enchanter's wand,
All owned that spell—thy page.

Read by the glimmering firelight,
In the greenwood alone,
Amid the gathered circle—who
But hath thy magic known?
Laid in the cottage window-seat,
Fanned by the open air,
Left by the palette and the deak,
Thou hast thy readers there.

Actual as friends we know and love,
The beings of thy mind
Are, like events of real life,
In memory enshrined:
We seem as if we heard their voice,
As if we knew their face—
Familiar with their inward thoughts,
Their beauty and their grace.

As if bound on a pilgrimage,
We visit now thy shore,
Haunted by all which thou hast gleaned
From the old days of yore:
We feel in every hill and heath
Romance which thou hast flung;
We say, 'Twas here the poet dwelt,
'Twas there of which he sung.

Remembering thee, we half forget
How vainly this is said;
There seemed so much of life in thee,
We cannot think thee dead.
Dead? dead? when there is on this earth
Such waste of worthless breath;
There should have gone a thousand lives
To ransom thee from death!

Now out on it! to hear them speak
Their idle words and vain,
As if it were a common loss
For nature to sustain.
It is an awful vacancy
A great man leaves behind,
And solemnly should sorrow fall
Upon bereaved mankind.

We have too little gratitude
Within the selfish heart,
Else with what anguish should we see
The great and good depart!
Methinks our dark and sinful earth
Might dread an evil day,
When Heaven, in pity or in wrath,
Calls its beloved away.

A fear and awe are on my soul,
To look upon the tomb,
And think of who are sleeping laid
Within its midnight gloom.

What glorious ones are gone!—thus light
Doth vanish from our spheres:
Out on the vanity of words!
Peace now, for thoughts and tears!

We are indebted to an esteemed friend for the subjoined letter, which contains the interesting particulars of the last moments of our distinguished and lamented countryman, and other matters concerning him which will interest the public.

"At half-past one on Friday the 21st, Sir Walter Scott breathed his last, surrounded by all his descendants, and apparently almost without a struggle. During some two or three days after his arrival at Abbotsford, he appeared to feel with satisfaction that he was once more at home; was occasionally wheeled, for half an hour, up and down his library, armoury, or garden; and even once or twice listened with apparent interest to a page of the Old Testament, or a favourite passage in Crabbe or Wordsworth; but after this he fell rapidly into the same stupor that had hung over him while he remained in London; and for full six weeks there had occurred hardly an interval of any thing approaching to collectedness. It was well that the curtain dropt when it did on a scene from which hope had all along been excluded. The symptoms of an organic change in the brain were not to be mistaken; and from the beginning his physicians, both in London and Edinburgh, predicted the exact manner, though not the exact time, of his deliverance.

He is to be buried on Wednesday next in his family aisle, within the ruins of Dryburgh Abbey, about eight miles down the Tweed, and among some of the loveliest scenery of that river. Sir Walter's grandmother was the last of the ancient race of the Haliburtons, Barons of Dryburgh, in whose right he quartered the arms of that house, and possessed one fragment of their scattered estates, — this, the place of their sepulture, where, six years ago, Lady Scott was interred.

Clearly as his end had been anticipated, it is impossible to give you any notion of the effect which the news of last Friday produced all over this part of the country. I believe the funeral, though meant, in accordance with his own request, to be a strictly private one, will be attended and witnessed by more than any that has ever occurred in Scotland.

I regret to add, that the reports in circulation respecting the condition in which Sir Walter has left his worldly affairs are black. I would fain hope that the fields he adorned, the castle he built, and the immense mass of literary and antiquarian curiosities he had assembled about him, are not really destined to pass from his blood, and be dispersed for ever: but such, I grieve to say, is what many consider as the most probable upshot. A few days, however, will clear up all this.

sir Walter was born August 15, 1771, and was consequently but little advanced in his sixty-second year when he died; the victim, no doubt, of excess in intellectual exertion—for of excess of any other description, even the companions of his youth never believed him capable. He has left two sons—the present Sir W. S., major of the 15th Hussars, and Charles, in the Foreign-office, and lately attaché to the embassy at Naples; with two daughters, Mrs. Lockhart and Miss Anne Scott: Mrs. L.'s children are as yet his only descendants in the second generation. He had survived many was; and we was; and we was; and we he style the originally, I believe, formed a family of fourteen."

From Mr. Parker, the medallist, we have also received the following, which we print literatim. The medal referred to is a striking likeness; but the letter is curious as expressing the writer's opinion both of the monarch, and of his own productions.

"Sir,—I would long ere now have answered your very obliging letter with the medals. That representing our Sovereign seems most beautifully executed, and is a striking resemblance. I have very little turn for imagining mottoes, it being long since I read the classics, which are the great storehouse of such things. I incline to think, that a figure or head of Neptune upon the reverse, with the mottoe round the exergue, Tridens Neptuni sceptrum mundi. I think this would be better than any mottoe more personally addressed to the king himself than to his high kingly office. I cannot, of course, be a judge of the other medal; but such of my family as are with me think it is very like. If there is any mottoe to be added, I should like the line because I am far more vain of having been able able to fix some share of public attention upon the ancient poetry and manners of my country, than of any original efforts which I have been able to make in literature.

"I beg you will excuse the delay which has taken place. Your obliging communication, with the packet which accompanied it, travelled from country to town, and from town to country, as it chanced to miss me upon the road. I have the honour to be, sir,

"Your obliged humble servant,

We could have filled our sheet with memoir and epistles, of which we possess many; but most of them mix up private affairs so much with matters of public interest, that we have deemed the above more proper for an occasion so immediately near our mighty loss.*

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

A DAY'S PLEASURE IN THE COUNTRY. "THERE are a great many pleasures of which I have not the slightest comprehension. All those included under the names of rural enjoyments, unsophisticated tastes, country pursuits, are to me marvels and mysteries. plans for the diffusion of happiness have even to my own eyes been impracticable; for all the world cannot live in London. I am, I confess it, born and bred, in theory and in practice, a Cockney. I have no fancy for sitting in a punt, catching fish and cold together, and going home with three gudgeons and a sore throat. Neither do I desire to enact perambulating poulterer, accumulating landed property enough for a freehold, in the shape of mud, on my boots; consigning in my secret soul every partridge to purgatory. I prefer a sofa to the most delicate green moss that was ever haunted by fairies. O, lakes that are so beautiful in poetry! O, prospects that are so lovely on paper! ye are about to lose for me all your charms-for I shall see them; and, alas! to see the beautics of nature is to reverse the old proverb, 'Seeing is not believing.'" Frank

* A particularly excellent portrait of Sir Walter, painted by Knight, for the late Terry, in 1825, was, we regret to say, destroyed only the other day by a fire at the house of Mr. Harding, Finchley, in whose possession it was; and we fear not engraved, as it might have been in the style the owner would have known so well how to command, had it been possible to foresee so unfortunate

Staunton was roused from his reverie by the loud blowing of a horn, on which the guard was expending breath enough to have lasted half an existence. Despite his soliloquy, he was fully alive to the exquisite though dusky landscape around: a purple shadow indicated the lovely lake of Ulleswater, upon which were fitting two or three scattered barks, with their phantom sails. Gleaming amid the trees, now in their thickest foliage, a light shone from admitted within his creed of lady-like. His all day; and light and air were things never exhis long journey, Frank hurried into bed; but tire, the London stranger to death. the instant all became hushed, his ear was caught by " the mournful music" of the nightingale, whose sweet complaint was now begun. " How very sweet!" exclaimed our hero-five minutes, ten, nearly a quarter of an hour; and though he at first concealed the fact from himself, that incessant "jug jug, trill trill," was excessively tiresome. Now, Frank Staunton had really some poetry about him—nay, had published renes full of tenderness and feeling about moonlight, nightingales, roses, and recollections; he had therefore a character to support: but it was at last not to be borne; he jumped out of bed, dashed down the window, with an ejaculation of, "That cursed bird!" Among other metropolitan predilections, was that of late rising; but by five o'clock next morning all the house was in motion: the children ran overhead as if, like the lances of old, they were shod with iron; and every cousin that passed along the passage thought it an act of courtesy to knock at his door. He got up in selfdefence; and as soon as he appeared, three parties at once contended for his company: his aunt wanted him to come and look at her turkeys-his uncle wanted him to see his pigs; while the boys were equally impatient that he should join their shooting party. As usual, clamour carried the day, and he was dragged off to the rookery. With Washington Irring strong on his memory, a rook-pie seemed little short of sacrilege. Such a waste of powder and noise as ensued! the rooks screamed, the children shouted, and every moment a gun went off close to his ear: and all this was to be taken fasting. Long before the summons came to the breakfast-table, Frank had arrived at the second stage of fasting, viz. a sick distaste to food: an appetite is not, like grouse, the better for keeping. The rapid way in which breakfast was despatched, did not permit of the hos-plant was despatched, did not permit of the hos-entertaining his companion with the history of song, which, however, they sang well. There is a species of entertainments peculiar to our islands, called in Wales "grass parties," in Jersey "milk parties," and at Greenwich and Richmond "pic-nics:" they are days devoted to all those inconveniences which at less-favoured periods would, to use an expressive Irishism, "set you mad." You give up the comforts of civilised life-tables and every cottage: the moon was not up, but the chairs are de trop-one glass does the work of evening star had many companions; and in many—and your dinner is spread on the grass, the West one clear and lucid line, like melted for the benefit of the ants, earwigs, and other amber, was yet bright with the memory of sun- insects. It was for the celebration of one of shine. The boughs of the hawthorn, on which these mistakes (for they are called pleasure) the dew was just rising, swept against the that the Selby family assembled in a large coach as it passed rapidly by; and the fragrance cart, without springs, destined to traverse the on either side told that the hay was making in roughest of roads that ever destroyed your the adjacent fields. The mail stopped at the nerves, and threatened your joints. Two corner of a lane, amid the clamour of a dozen young men joined the party, and, quite as young voices, asking, in every variety of tone, matter of right, appropriated the seats by the if "their cousin was arrived." "How d'ye two eldest girls; and Frank was jammed into do's?" and "I am glad to see you's," were an inconceivably small space between his uncle soon despatched :--so was supper. Frank saw and his aunt, both of whom maintained an unthat his female cousins were pretty, ill-dressed, ceasing flow of discourse-one touching his turand with louder laugh and voice than were nips, the other touching her turkeys; while the younger children kept up an incessant and uncle and aunt were of that denomination Babelish din. At length they arrived at a called respectable, worthy, matter of fact people, nook in a small wood: the father and mother, who have no nerves, and whose ideality has with the four younger ones, stayed behind to get never been developed. "We have chosen dinner ready, while they enjoined the others your bed-room," said his eldest cousin, at to go and walk for an appetite;—an injunction parting, " because the nightingale sings in the Frank, at least, thought very needless. Howtree opposite." The room was very low, and ever, off they went, under a broiling sun, over felt very hot-for the sun had been shining on it hedge, ditch, hill, and dale; while to Staunton it was obvious that the two young men took cluded from Ulleswater Cottage. Fatigued with an underbred pleasure in tiring, or trying to

"Sad was the hour, and luckless was the day, When first from Schiraz walls I bent my way," thought Frank, as he toiled up the half-dozenth hot hill, for the sake of the prospect, which he alone was expected to admire—the others, as they observed, having seen it so often. At length they returned to the little wood; the stump of an old oak looked very inviting, and there Frank was about to sit, when his second cousin, William, caught his arm, exclaiming, "Lord, mother! you have laid the cloth close by the wasp's nest." All hurried off-but not till Staunton's left hand was as an armoury, in which a score of wasps had left their stings. All hurried off, two or three dishes and plates broken, also the gooseberry pie dropped in the scuffle; but as soon as they were seated, due attention was bestowed on Frank's wounds; a key was produced from Mrs. Selby's ponderous pocket, destined to extract the stings; and when, in spite of the universal declaration, "that it was the best thing in the world," he averred his conviction that it was the worst, and withdrew his hand, it had just the appearance of a honeycomb. Dinner proceeded; all seated themselves on the grass, nobody knowing what to do with their feet or their plates, Christians not being so handy as Turks. There was some romping, and a great deal of laughter excited by that local wit which is so utterly unintelligible to a stranger. Mr. Selby ate like an Abyssinian, and drank like a Saxon: he was one of those true-born Englishmen whose morality is beef, and whose patriotism is The repast was concluded, and both he and his wife dropped off in their accustomed nap, with the mutual exclamation, " Frank, we have a water-party in store for you to-morrow." The party dispersed: Staunton saw the receding figures of his two fair cousins called forth by the sight of his undiminished his brown mare's cold, and the other was being eloquent in praise of his liver-coloured pointer: the ladies, however, seemed very well entertained. The wind had changed, and it was one of those raw, piercing evenings which pay November the delicate flattery of imitation: there was a melancholy rustling in the leaves, a dim mist rising from the lake; and the visitor walked "the greenwood glade" alone, his teeth chattering, and a small chill rain beating in his face. This small rain gradually took a more decided form, and a heavy pelting shower. Mr. Selby's voice was heard calling on the party to assemble together: they did so, and again the cart bore its crowded company. Suddenly it was discovered that Staunton was missing. To make short of a long story, they called, they hunted, but in vain : it was now getting dark, and home they were obliged to go-but minus their cousin. One supposed he was drowned, and another that he had fallen into some old gravel-pits; a third suggested that murders had been committed ere now. The evening closed in on a collection of those lugubrious tales that are the delight of an English fire-side. But the next day they were, indeed, seriously alarmed; for no tidings could be learned of Frank Staunton. A ghastly fear seized on the whole neighbourhood -he might have been Burked! Sacks and pitch-plasters were that day the sole topics of discourse in the neighbourhood of Ulleswater. Next morning, however, came the post, and with it a letter: it was from Frank Staunton, and ran thus :-

My dearest Aunt,-There are some temptations that are irresistible; that of the London mail passing by my path, proved so to me. I called to the coachman, got up by the guard, and was miles on my journey before I remembered aught but the happiness of a return to town. I shall ever retain the most grateful recollection of your kindness; I will send my cousins the prettiest of the new Annuals this year: but I've "made a vow, and registered it in heaven," never again to stir beyond the bills of mortality. -Your affectionate nephew,

FRANK STAUNTON.

DRAMA.

KING'S THEATRE.

REPORT says that Mr. Mason will not be the lessee of the Italian Opera next season, and that Mr. Laporte will. The efforts of the former certainly deserved more success; but theatres are extremely like lottery property.

DRURY LANE.

DRURY LANE opened on Saturday with the silliest of plays, the Soldier's Daughter, the Irish Tutor, and Midas. The first seemed to have been selected for the sake of the gag (to use a theatrical term) it contained touching "the late Miss Mordaunt," who enacted the Widow Cheerly; but the allusions produced no effect. The only other debut was that of Mr. Mathews, from the Dublin theatre, as Mr. Malfort-a character which offers nothing for criticism, except that the performer appeared to be respectable, and rather constrained in his attitudes. In the Irish Tutor, Power, as usual, kept the house awake with laughter; and in Midas the bright-eyed Miss Ferguson enacted Apollo, though a part above feminine powers, especially on a large stage, with great talent. Nysa and Daphne were represented by Miss Betts and Miss Cawse, whose respective Ayliffe, from Bath, performed Dr. Flail and Sileno, both in a manner which proved him to he a useful actor.

On Monday, Mr. Stauley, from Dublin, made his bow in Romeo. He is a well-looking young man, and will play second-fiddle cleverly, after the ordeal of debut has subsided into propriety, Tuesday presented us with the ever-welcome, ever-young, and, we would almost say, everimproving Braham in Massanielo, which highly gratified the audience. Power, in Teddy the Tiler, is even better than Power in Dr. O'Toole. The Hunchback, with Farren and Miss Phillips, was the chief feature of Thursday; Mr. Stanley was the Modus, and Miss Mordaunt the Helen; but they did not improve on their predecessors, Abbott and Miss Taylor.

HAYMARKET.

THE principal performers who have supported the leading characters here, Farren, Cooper, Harley, &c., having been called off to their engagements at Drury Lane, the managers have remodelled the company for the conclusion of the campaign, their fourth month, and brought forward several new actors, Mr. Haines and Mr. Burton, of considerable abilities - the former in tragic parts, the latter in low comedy. We do not, however, find any thing demanding specific notice; and we fear the latter end of the season will not redeem the depression of the beginning.

VARIETIES.

Cholera. - What is there that the thirst of gain will not attempt to turn to profit! Much money has been made by drugs puffed as specifics for this afflicting disease; and brandies. and flannels, and baths, and belts, and a hundred other articles have pushed into request as preservatives against the threatened danger. But it was reserved for the ingenuity of German speculation to establish an insurance office. at Dusseldorff, against cholera risks !

Northern Expedition. - Messrs. Brandt and Sons, of Archangel, have despatched two vessels, commanded by officers of the Russian navy, whose object is to survey the great gulf of the Icy Sea between Archangel and Tobolsk, and to explore the mouth of the river Jenissey. The bearing of this expedition upon the north. east passage gives an additional interest to its mercantile character.

New Gun-Carriage. - Captain Pole, of the Maidstone, has been trying experiments with an improved gun-carriage, the merits of which are well spoken of in the naval circles.

Mr. J. Howard Payne Accounts from New York shew that America, at least, is not the country in which a prophet or a poet is not duly honoured. This author of many dramatic pieces has succeeded his greater contemporary, Washington Irving, in a flattering reception on his return by his fellow-citizens, and is cordially panegyrised by the press.

The Surrey Zoological Gardens.—The fine weather of the past week tempted us, as it has, we were told, done nearly a thousand persons daily, to pay a vist to this very interesting resort; and we were so highly gratified with it, that we cannot but regret having so long de-layed the pleasure. The grounds are laid out with infinite taste, and the collection of animals of every description, and in the best possible order, furnish a treat alike delightful to the young and curious, and to the lover of natural history. The lions, tigers, and fiercer creatures, are in a light and open structure, which shews them to the utmost advantage; while lamas, camels, gnus, antelopes, deer, &c. &c. are seen browsing in paddocks and fit enclosures. Elsewhere are birds of every kind, from the ostrich and eagle to the minute wax-beak and avorduval. Singular monkeys, boas enlivened by the solar heat, and a multitude of other objects equally worthy of notice, afford the visiter a few hours of as much rational enjoyment as can be reaped from any exhibition of this nature; and to see the animals in something like their native habits is a wonderful improvement upon the old fashion of housemenagerie and close caravan. We recommend the sight most cordially, both for amusement and instruction.

Mr. Planché's "His first Campaign," a his of a name for Laporte at Covent Garden, and also fortunate in the story mingling French and English in alliance together, is to be produced with great military force and splendour. The Shylock of the evening is, we are told, quite a boy of seventeen years of age, from Glasgow.

The Adelphi promises much variety, having not only a new piece, founded on the capital tale of Rip Van Winkle, but the popular Pet of the Petticoats, imported with Mrs. Fitzwilliams from Sadler's Wells, and Reeve's inimitable Cupid, from the English Opera, with the pretty Mrs. Honey as his Psyche.

The Olympic announcement displays a strong company for petit comédie and burletta. Vestris, Orger, and Liston, head the entertaining list.

Fernando Po.—We are informed that govern. | METEOROLOGICAL JOURNAL, 1832. ment has ordered the breaking up of the colony at Fernando Po. The expense, and the unhealthiness of the establishment, are the causes assigned for abandoning this important check on the slave-trade.

The Diagraph. - Under this name a very ingenious instrument, invented by M. Gavard, a pupil of the Polytechnic School at Paris, is now exhibiting in Leicester Square. It is a summary of all the instruments hitherto employed for the linear representation of objects. Its optical and graphic combinations are infinite. It traces on all plane, conical, or cylindrical surfaces, perspectively or geometrically, drawinge of the natural size, or the reduction or enlargement of a landscape, a picture, a print, or, in short, any object whatever.

General Observations. - The mean temperature General Observations.— The mean temperature was less than in the last two years, yet there was very little rain, the quantity being less than since 1826, and nearly two-thirds fell on the 12th, in a thunder-storm, which continued upwards of two hours, from half-past 7 until 10 P.M., during which there was some heavy thunder and much vivid lightning. The extreme of heat never reached the maximum of 1830 and 1831, in the same month; but the mean of the barometer was higher than since. In the mean of the barometer was higher than since. the maximum of 1830 and 1831, in the same month; but the mean of the barometer was higher than since July 1825. Rain fell only on five different days; and until the latter part of the month, when the clouds shewed symptoms of a change, the weather was very fine, the wind hanging generally to the northward.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are at a loss to conceive how we should have fallen into the error of stating, in our notice last week of Archdeacon Cotton's Explanation of Obsolete Words occurring in the authorised version of the Bible, that the trainslation now in common use is the one called "the Bishops' Bible" (1568): it should unquestionably have been mentioned that, in addition to the six enumerated by us, King James commanded a revision of the Bishops' to be made in 1611, and that this is the lection now established by law.

We have so many novelties for this dull publishing period in our present No. that we must defer the later arrivals—E. Welbon's edition of Sarras's Lafsyette, John Shipp's Eastern Story Teller, &c., &c.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

Fisher's Drawing-Room Sorap-Book; with Poetical Illustrations by L. E. L. 1833. 4to. Fisher, Son, and Jackson.

THE great popularity of the Scrap-Book for 1832 has rightly encouraged the publication of another volume, still more pleasingly enriched with interesting works of art, and still more beautifully illustrated by the pen of the poet. It was happily said of Goldsmith, nullum quod tetigit non ornavit; and if ever the same eulogy was applicable to another writer, it is eminently due to the sweet, the touching, and the varied strains of L. E. L. We know not how to express our admiration of her genius; though the remark is rather excited by the peculiar nature of the volume before us, than justified by it in the ample degree which it is where the theme is imagined, not given, and the original conceptions of her mind expanded upon a single and congenial subject. But it is still very surprising to us to see such a performance as this, produced in such a way. Thirty-six engravings of every description are offered to the fancy of the writer; and upon each something of general interest is expected. The task appears to us to be a literary series like the labours of Hercules;—at least, we feel that to illustrate one or two prints with any degree of talent would be enough for the generality even of favourite authors. Perhaps increase of ability may grow with its expenditure, as increase of appetite with what it feeds on ; but of both we are doubtful; and we can only impute L. E. L.'s prolific effusion of poetical pathos, thought, and beauty, over these pictures, to the possession of an inexhaustible store of intellect and imagination.

Our selections shall be made to justify this panegyric; for as far as merit is concerned, there is no matter which of the poems we take for our examples.

We begin, however, with Admiral Collingwood; a stirring description of naval feeling, and a splendid portraiture of a true British hero.

"Methinks it is a glorious thing
To sall upon the deep;
A thousand sailors under you,
Their watch and ward to keep:

To see your gallant battle-flag So scornfully unrolled, As scarcely did the wild wind dare To stir one crimson fold:

To watch the frigates scattered round, Like birds upon the wing; et know they only wait your will— It is a glorious thing.

Our admiral stood on the deck, And looked upon the sea; He held the glass in his right hand, And far and near looked he:

He could not see one hostile ship Abroad upon the main; From east to west, from north to south, It was his own domain.

Good news is this for Old England,'
Forth may her merchants fare;
Thick o'er the sea, no enemy
Will cross the pathway there.

A paleness came upon his cheek, A shadow to his brow; Alas! our good Lord Collingwood, What is it alls him now?

Tears stand within the brave man's eyes, Each softer pulse is stirred; It is the sickness of the heart, Of hope too long deferred.

He's pining for his native seas, And for his native shore: All but his honour he would give, To be at home once more.

He does not know his children's fare; His wife might pass him by, He is so altered, did they meet, With an unconscious eye:

He has been many years at sea, He's worn with wind and wave; He asks a little breathing space Between it and his grave:

He feels his breath come heavily, His keen eye faint and dim; It was a weary sacrifice That England asked of him.

He never saw his home again— The deep voice of the gun, The lowering of his battle-flag, Told when his life was done.

His sailors walked the deck and wept; Around them howled the gale; And far away two orphans knelt— A widow's cheek grew pale.

Amid the many names that light Our history's blazoned line, I know not one, brave Collingwood, That touches me like thine."

The next subject is Boscastle Waterfall. not far from common-place, yet how nobly is it turned to a view of Westminster Abbey, with all its fine associations!

ts fine associations!

Oh, gloomy quarry! thou dost hide in thee
The tower and shrine:
The city vast, and grand, and wonderful,
And strong, is thine.
Look at the mighty buildings of our land,
What once were they,
Ere they rose, fashioned by the cunning hand,
In proud array?
One fronts me now, a temple beautiful,
Touched by the light
Which has so much of beaven—the light of eve,
Golden and bright.
In dull rellef against the cloudy sky
These turrest rise:
Our fine old Abbey, where the dust of kings
Tranquilly lies,
Winning the eye, amid the crowded street,
To other thought,
Than that the haste, the noise, the changeful scene,
Around me brought.
Mingling in air, the twin-born spires
So nobly stand:
They seem eternal, yet they are the work,
Man, of thy hand.
Yet must they first have in some quarry lain,
Rude, shapeless, lone,
Until the mind of man inspired his hand
To work in stone.
Alas! the contrast between us and what
We can create;
That man should be so little in himself—

We can create;
That man should be so little in himself—
His works so great!"

From the ancient cathedral pass we to the opposite-the busy, mercantile town of Liverpool, which is painted with an equal spirit; and, again, another beautiful reference introduced to the African Expedition.

"Where are they bound, those gallant ships,
That here at anchor ile,
Now quiet as the birds that sleep
Beneath a summer skv.
Their white wings droop, their shadows sweep
Unbroken o'er the deep,
As if the airy elements
Had their own hour of sleep.
A little while the wind will rise,
And every ship will be,
With plashing prow and shining sail,
Afar upon the sea.

Some will go east, and some go west,
Some to the Indian isles,
Where Spring is lavish of her bloom,
And Summer of her smiles;
And some will seek the latitudes
Where northern breezes blow,
And Winter builds a throne of ice
Upon a world of snow.
Some will come back with plume and pearl,
The altar and the gem;
Little do the gay wearers think
How brave men toil for them.
The product of far distant lands,
Nurst by far distant skies,
Are here the triumph and reward
Of human enterprise.
Amid the ships that bear around
The wealth of half the world,
Are those that, for the Quorra bound,
Have just their sails unfurled.
Freighted with goods that new-found climes
May envy English skill,
They bear no thunders o'er the deep
To work our nation's will.
In peace they go, with pure intent,
And with this noble aim—
Barbaric hordes to civilise,
By traffic to reclaim.
They go for knowledge, and in hope
Such knowledge may avail

Barbaric hordes to civilise,
By traffic to reclaim.
They go for knowledge, and in hope
Such knowledge may avail
To draw the savage and unknown
Within the social pale.
A deep and ardent sympathy
The heart has with the bold;
The cheek is flushed, the eye is bright,
Wherein their deeds are told:
We half forget the conqueror's crime
In honour of the brave,
And raise the banner and the arch,
Although upon the grave.
But here the danger and the toll
Of no false light have need,
Though courage and though constancy
Deserve the highest meed.
The gloomy night, when rocks and foes

The lion at their side —
The gloomy night, when rocks and foes
Were on the faithless tide.
'Mid slavery, suffering, deserts, death,
It has been theirs to roam,
Led onward by that general thought,
'What will they say at home?'
Science, thy own adventurers
Again are on their way;
And but for thy most glorious hopes,
What were our mental day?
Sail on, proud bark, a lofty aim
It was that freighted thee;
And for their sake who tread thy decks,
God speed thee o'er the sea?'

Tintagel Castle suggests a touching legend.

"Alone in the forest Sir Lancelot rode, O'er the neck of his courser the reins lightly flow'd, And beside hung his helmet, for bare was his brow, To meet the soft breeze that was fanning him now.

Beneath, the small wild flowers were many and sweet, And, crush'd at each step by the war-horse's feet, Gave forth all their fragrance; while thick overhead The boughs of the oak and the elm-tree were spread.

The wind stirr'd the branches, as if its low suit Were urged, like a lover who wakens the lute; And through the dark foliage came sparkling and bright, Like rain through the green leaves, in small gems of light.

There was stillness—not silence; for, dancing along, A brook went its way, like a child with a song; Now hidden, where rushes and water-flagg grow—Now clear, while white pebbles were glistening below.

Lo, bright as a vision and fair as a dream, The face of a maiden is seen in the stream! With her hair, like a mantle of gold, to her knee, Stands a lady as lovely as lady can be.

Few words for a love-tale—the bard's sweetest words Are poor beside those which each memory hoards; Dream of some gentle whisper, the haunted and low, Such as love may have murmur'd—ah, long, long ago!

She led him away to an odorous cave,
Where the emerald spars shone like stars in the wave;
And the green moss and violets crowded beneath,
And the ash at the entrance hung down like a wreath.

They might have been happy, if love could but learn From some flowers a lesson, and like their leaves turn Round their own inward world, their own fragrant nest, Content with its sweetness, content with its re-Content with its sweetness, content with its rest.

But the sound of the trumpet was heard from afar,

And Sir Lancelot rode forth again to the war;

And the wood-nymph was left as nye woman will be,

Who trusts her whole being, O faise Love! to thee.

For months, every sun-beam that brightend the gloom, She deem'd was the waving of Lancelot's plume; She knew not the proud and the beautiful queen, Whose image was treasured as her's once had been.

There was many a dame, there was many a knight, Made the banks of the river like fairy-land bright; And among those whose shadow was cast on the tide, Was Lancelot kneeling near Gunevra's side.

With purple sails heavily drooping around, The mast and the prow with the vale lily bound; And tow'd by two swans, a small vessel drew near, But high on the deck was a pall-cover'd bier.

They rowed with their white wings the bark through the flood.

Till arrived at the bank where Sir Lancelot stood:
A wind swept the river, and flung back the pall,
And there lay a lady, the fairest of all.

But pale as a statue, like sunshine on snow, The bright hair seem'd mocking the cold face below: Sweet truants, the blush and the smile are both fled,— Sir Lancelot weeps as he kneels by the dead.

And these are love's histories; a vow and a dream, And the sweet shadow passes away from life's stream; Too late we awake to regret — but what tears Can bring back the waste to our hearts and our years!

A mere portrait, that of Sir Thomas Lawrence, awakens the poet's love of art; and the transition from its living practice to its origin is exquisitely made.

"Divinest art, the stars above
Were fated on thy birth to shine;
Oh, born of beauty and of love,
What early poetry was thine! What early poetry was thine!
The softness of Ionian night
Upon Ionian summer lay,
One planet gave its vesper light,
Enough to guide a lover's way;
And gave the fountain as it play'd
The semblance of a silvery shower,
And as its waters fell, they made
A music meet for such an hour:
That, and the tones the gentle wind
Won from the leaf, as from a lute,
In natural melody combined,
Now that all ruder sound was mute;
And odours floated on the air,
As many a nymph had just unbound
The wreath that braided her dark hair,
And flung the fragrant tresser roundFillow'd on violet leaves, which prest

And flung the fragrant treases round.

Pillow'd on violet leaves, which prest
Fill'd the sweet chamber with their sighs,
Lull'd by the lyre's low notes to rest,
A Grecian youth in slumber lies;
And at hisside a malden stands,
The dark hair braided on her brow,
The lute within her slender hands,
But hush'd is all its music now;
She would not wake him from his dreams,
Although she has so much to say,
Although she has so much to say,
Will see her warrior far away;
How fond and earnest is the gase
Upon these sleeping features thrown,
She who yet never dared to raise
Her timid eyes to meet his own.

Her timid eyes to meet his own.
She bends her lover's rest above,
Thoughtful with gentle hopes and fears,
And that unutterable love
Which never yet spoke but in tears!
She would not that those tears should fail
Upon the cherish'd sleeper's face;
She turns, and sees upon the wall
Its imaged shade, its perfect grace.
With eager hand she mark'd each line
The shadowy brow, the arching head—
Till some creative power divine
Love's likeness o'er love's shadow spread.

Since then, what passion and what power Has dwelt upon the painter's art! How has it soothed the absent hour, With looks that wear life's lovellest part!

O, painter of our English isle,
Whose name is now upon my line,
Who gave to beauty's blush and smile
All that could make them most divine! The fair Ionian's ancient claim Was never paid, till paid by thee,
And thou didst honour to her name
By shewing what her sex can be."

"Dim faith of other times, when earth was young, And eager in belief; when men were few, And felt their nothingness; not then elate With numbers, science, and the victories Which history registers o'er vanquish'd time—For time is vanquish'd by discovery, By arts which triumph over common wants, By knowledge, which bequeaths the following age All that its predecessor sought and won. But thou, O ancient creed, hast nought of this! Others have given immortality
To their bold founders: he who worshipp'd fire, And taught the Magi how to read the stars,
The Persian Zorosster, left a name;
And he, too, of the crescent and the sword, Who sternlike swept on his appointed way, Is still his followers' war-cry. These beliefs
Are obvious in their workings; we can trace
The one great mind that set the springs in play, By which the human puppets rise and fall. Ambition, avarice, cruelty, and fear,
The natural inmates of the heart in man,
Are stirr'd by some adventurer, who knows
How superstition can be made the bond
To fetter thousands. I can understand
The rise and progress of such earthly creed.
O, vanity of vanities is writ
Upon all things of earth—but what can wear
The writing on its forehead like this shrine?
It is a mighty thing to teach mankind
A new idolatry, to bind the weak
In their own fancies, to incite the strong
By high imaginations, future hopes,
Which fill the craving in all noble hearts
For things beyond themselves, beyond their sphere.
All human gifts must concentrate in him
Who can originate a new belief—
The fiery eloquence that stirs the soul,
The poetry that can create a world
More lovely than our own, and body forth,
Its glorious creation, and yet blend
This fine enthusiasm with an eye
Worldly and keen, which sees in others' faults,
Frailties, and follies, but the many means
Which work to its own ends: yet, out on pride!
Such men may live, fullid their destiny,
No memory, but failen monuments,
Haunted by dim tradition."

Statistics of France. By Lewis Goldsmith. 8vo. pp. 336. London, 1832. Hatchard

THIS volume contains more actual information respecting France than almost if not all the other works treating of that country with which we happen to be acquainted. Mr. Goldsmith may have his own political views; but he is not a partisan, writing entirely on one side, and distorting every thing, to blacken those whom whom he agrees and make demigods of those with whom he agrees and acts. But, besides, he has bestowed much research upon every branch of his subject; and having had recourse to the most authentic official documents, his information on many important points is of great national interest: national not only as applying to France, but to the rest of Europe, whose condition is intimately blended with the political temper and means of that country.

Having thus briefly noticed the general merits of this volume, we shall endeavour to afford our readers some idea of its value; but in doing so, we must confess our inability within the compass of a Review even to enter upon many of the questions, discussions, and statements of the highest public interest. On the contrary, we must be content to touch, and that but Was never paid, till paid by thee,
And thou didst honour to her name,
By shewing what her sex can be."

As if to try the author's powers, there are several East Indian views in this volume, but In a preface Mr. Goldsmith casts a ooup-d'ail

1828. Soon after his retirement, a pitiful effort rendered particularly important by the appointment of the new ministry now on the tapis.

"From the restoration till 1830 I found France flourishing and prosperous—her revenues, commerce, and industry, in a progressive state of increase. The country, blessed with an excellent climate, a fruitful soil, and comparatively free from taxes, was universally admitted to be one of the happiest in Europe. But how does the case stand now? reader will see that there has been every year since the revolution of 1830 a deficit in the revenue; commerce has decreased, and confidence in the commercial world is paralysed. This year there will probably be a further falling off in the revenue. The cholera has extended its ravages over half the kingdom, and four departments have been suffering under the horrors of civil war:—nay, it will be a question whether the inhabitants of these departments can be compelled to pay taxes, after the illegal measures of government exercised towards them; at least, in refusing to pay them they will be supported by the doctrines of the liberals during the Polignac administration, which were, that should ministers violate the charter, no one ought to pay taxes. The measures adopted by government in June 1832 have been judicially declared to be a violation of the charter.

"On the second restoration, in consequence of the conduct of the partisans of Napoleon, the king might have abolished the charter altogether; and who could have blamed him for it? Nothing of the kind, however, was done or thought of: but no sooner was the king again seated on his throne, than a regular system of treason was organised. Lyons and Grenoble were in a state of open rebellion; the authors were brought to trial and executed: this, however, did not quench the spirit of treason. A few years afterwards a rebellion was regularly organised at Saumur, at Colmar, at Strasburgh, and in many other places. A few of the leaders suffered the penalty of their crime, such as General Berton at Saumur, Colonel Caron at Strasburgh, a sub-lieutenant, Bories, and two others, at Paris, for the conspiracy of La Rochelle. The Duc de Berry was assassinated by a fanatic who had been employed as a sadler in the stables of Bonaparte. Two men were sent to the galleys who let off fire-works in the dead of night under the windows of the Duchess de Berry's bedchamber, to frighten her at the time she was pregnant of the Duc de Bordeaux. Secret societies were established in every town of France in the spirit of the carbonari, under the specious title of Aide-toi, le Ciel l'aidera. As to the press, nothing could have been more violent; no matter who was minister, whether De Richelieu, Decazes, De Villèle, De Martignac, or De Polignac:—nay, the minister who was most abused by the so-called liberal papers was M. Decazes, than whom a more enlightened and liberal man, in the best sense of these words, is not in existence. This I do not advance from hearsay, but from long personal acquaintance. All parties admit that no minister in France since the restoration displayed so much talent in the finance department as M. Villèle; and for a time no minister was more popular: but ministerial popularity in France is never of long duration. Discontent France is never of long duration.

and we conclude with the lines on Sarnat, a following quotations, treating of men and things | been?—Ed. L. G.

was made in the Chamber of Deputies to stigmatise his ministry as 'deplorable.' But his very adversaries have since done him justice: no longer ago than the 16th of January, 1832, M. Pagès, a deputy of the extreme gauche, pronounced in the chamber those words I have given as a motto; the prosperity there spoken of undoubtedly commenced with M. de Vil-lèle's administration. The Martignac ministry, which succeeded that of M. de Villèle, soon felt that they were not on a bed of roses!

"I believe I have produced facts sufficient to prove that the throne of Charles X. had for some time been tottering-his ordonnances crushed it. But the glorious revolution of 1830 did not produce all the happiness that was expected from it. Those of the actors who obtained lucrative situations under the new management, allowed the performances to go on quietly; but such as could not obtain engagements began to grumble, down to the scene-shifters and candle-snuffers. And as to the audience, the sovereign, 'the setters-up and pullers-down of kings, they, God help them, soon discovered the truth of Montaigne's observation - Le peuple est une bête, que chacun monte à son In other parts of the world a revolution is considered a catastrophe - but in France it is regarded as a luxury. It is, therefore, a little unreasonable for Frenchmen to grumble when they find the taxes increase, and that the new government is not a cheap one. Every class of people, especially in Paris, has felt, more or less, that the change of the elder for the younger branch has not produced the benefit expected from it: no wonder, then, that the ministries since the revolution of 1830 have not pleased the people, seeing that not the ministers alone, but the monarchy they serve, owe their existence to an explosion of the popular will. The first administration, including the names of the Duke de Broglie, Count Molé, and M. Guizot, refused either to lead or to follow the party of the 'mouvement;' and in consequence, although men of undoubted talents, soon lost their popularity. It was only, however, a domestic 'mouvement' to which they were opposed—for they did not soruple to interfere in the affairs of Spain, Belgium, and Germany. This doctrinaire ministry was succeeded by that of Messrs. Lasitte, Barthe, Merilhon, and Montalivet, who were not so sternly opposed to the laisses aller of the revo-lution. The change, however, did not prevent the riots which occurred on the trial of the ministers of Charles X., whose murder was loudly called for by the ci-devant supporters of the new government. On that occasion M. Montalivet behaved most gallantly in defend-ing the prisoners against the mob. The new ministry, in its turn, became unpopular, and had only a four months' existence, when M. Casimir Périer became the head of the cabinet. During his career, which was fourteen months, there were also many émeutes; but it must be admitted that appearances were preserved of order and good government. The cholera and anxiety, however, put an end to M. Périer. He was detested by his liberal adversaries, because he admitted that the revolution of 1830 was not based upon the principle of the 'so-vereignty of the people.' And M. Royer Collard, in the oration he delivered at the minister's funeral, declared what was true, that M. Périer ' did not court the revolution of 1830.' Soon after M. Périer's death, a new revolutionary era commenced by a coup d'état on the by ordering them to give notice to the police part of the government. Four of the western departments had been, with little intermission, since the revolution of 1830, in a state of open hostility against the new government. The liberals of the Chamber of Deputies, and their partisans in the newspapers, particularly the Courrier Français and the Constitutionnel, called vehemently on government to put those departments in a state of siege, and so to place their inhabitants in effect beyond the pale of the law. This liberal demand was complied with; but the editors of the Paris journals did not suppose that ministers would dare to treat the Parisians with as much severity as they did the Vendeans. At the funeral of General Lamarque, on the 5th June, 1832, Vive la république! vive Napoléon II! and vive la liberté! were shouted by thousands. Red flags, the symbol of anarchy during the reign of terror, were openly displayed by men on foot and on horseback. The people, The people, the military, and the national guards, were killing each other as fast as they could. carnage commenced on the evening of the 5th, and continued till four o'clock the following afternoon, when tranquillity was generally restored. On the 6th, early in the morning, police agents and soldiers entered the printingoffices of the Tribune, a liberal, the Courrier de l'Europe and la Quotidienne, two royalist newspapers, and, before the papers were even printed, seized the types, broke the presses, and committed every kind of devastationarresting the editors, compositors, pressmen. and, in short, every one they met with. M. Bérard, editor of the Cancans, was sent to prison handcuffed, chained to a common thief. So much for the liberty of the press, and for the security of newspaper property under a charter, which says—'All Frenchmen have the right to publish and print their opinions; the But a still censorship is for ever abolished.' greater outrage was reserved for the gentlemen of the French press. It has already been stated that order was restored on the 6th: to the great astonishment of every one, however, excepting those who are acquainted with the freaks of Bonapartean liberty, a royal ordonnance appeared in the Moniteur of the 7th, declaring Paris in a state of siege!

"The ordonnance of the 7th of June was but an alter idem of those of Charles X,; but the patriotic deputies on the latter occasion acted more coolly; indeed, the weather was not so hot in June 1832 as it was in July 1830. Those who had obtained places under the new government thought the late ordonnance constitutional_the ministers of Charles X. thought their's even legal. The disinterested patriots who are yet unprovided for, made no stir: one had a migraine, went to bed, and took camomile; another had an indigestion, kept his room, and took tisane; a third having over-exerted himself at the close of the session, his lungs became affected-it was therefore natural enough that he should go into the country to take asses' milk! Such, at least, in sober seriousness, were the reasons assigned for this unwouted instance of discretion. Three liberals of the first water, sgainst whom warrants were issued—Messrs. Cabet, Laboissière, and Gar-nier Pagès, all members of the Chamber of Deputies, and ordonnateurs of the funeral of Gen. Lamarque, kept out of the way till the siege was taken off, when they surrendered to the civil magistrates :

'The better part of valour is discretion.' An attempt was made, under pretence of an of a very intelligent person, residing within old law of 1764, to make spies of the surgeons, the sphere he describes, and enjoying better of the patients they attended for recent wounds. To their honour be it stated, the surgeons resisted this mandate; and the legal authorities did not venture to enforce it. Even the proprietors of the puppet-shows were ordered to send a programme of their exhibitions to the

" The late disturbances were but an echo of the others: the riots of July, called ' the three glorious days,' succeeded and ended in a revo-lution. The riots in June, in consequence of their failure, are called 'the two inglorious days,' and the rioters, instead of being decorated with ribands, are sent to the galleys.

But treason ne'er succeeds: Pray, what's the reason? If it succeeds, why, none dare call it treason."

"I cannot blame a government for defending itself when attacked. The French are proverbially difficult to manage. If the late ordonnance had been promulgated during the riots, while the streets were blocked up by barricades, and the city in the hands of the mob, the ministers might have justified themselves on the plea of necessity. If we except the periods when Louis XI., Cardinal Richelieu, and Napoleon, ruled France, the country has constantly been exposed to convulsion. And for the welfare of a country in which I have long resided, sometimes not unhappily, I fear that no government will ever be able to maintain itself long. A late noble foreign se-cretary, who was formerly employed in a high diplomatic capacity on the continent, may recollect what Fouché said to him at Paris in 1814, as to the instability of all governments in France, and the probability that in less than twenty years the country would split itself into twenty republics. The fact is, the only idea Frenchmen have of liberty is to upset the existing government-no matter what follows: they have always said, and still say, that they know very well what they don't like, though not quite agreed about what they do. As soon as a government is changed, they instantly cry for war. Immediately after the revolution of 1830, and before the government was tolerably settled, they said— We must destroy the treaties of 1815.' To-day they want the limit of the Rhine-to-morrow the Vistula. If the new government hesitates to comply with their ravings, then plots, conspiracies, and emeutes, are the order of the day! To such a state of things is France reduced. Liberty they care not a jot about-or rather, they have no practical idea of its meaning, always mixing up the grossest despotism with the sacred name of liberty. • • • The cause of the turbulence of the present French generation is, that every man—nay, every half-educated youngster—thinks himself as qualified as a Jeremy Bentham to become a manufacturer of constitutions. Of course this description of persons, no matter of what country, are always desirous of change. The great Frederic judged well of their character when he said, that if he were disposed to punish any of his provinces, he would send a reformer to govern them. And what have these late changes in France led to? I think the question is fairly answered by the following epitaph on a tomb-stone of one of the ' heroes of July:'

' Passant! va dire à l'Europe Que nous sommes morts Pour enrichir une centaine de pleds-plats.' "

We have quoted these passages, neither as adopting them, defending all their opinions, nor impugning them, but simply as the remarks of acquiring a correct knowledge of characters. of events, and of their motives and springs. We shall now endeavour to relieve their politicalness by a few anecdotes, which are introduced into the inquiry into the criminal code, punishments, prisons, &c., the misery and depravity of which are beyond the powers of language to paint. Mr. G. says:—

[&]quot;L'empire nous donna la gloire sans modèle. La restauration nous donna la prospérité sans exemple. La gloire est tombée avec l'empire, la prospérité est tombée avec la restauration."

"The personal history and adventures of a few inmates of the receptacles of vice, might better, perhaps, be consigned to some parallel to the Newgate Calendar, than be offered as an illustration of the statistics of crime and punishment. The following, however, will per-haps be accepted by the reader as a relief from the dry details with which he has hitherto been occupied. As titled persons have always precedence, we shall begin with the history of the Count Pontes de St. Helena, a well-known robber, without diplomacy! This man's name is Cognard; his parents were honest industrious people, and gave him a decent education, which did not, however, prevent his quitting the paternal roof to become a robber. For some offence he was condemned to the galleys at Toulon for ten years, and branded. From thence he made his escape into Spain, where he joined the French army in 1809. He remained there till the conclusion of the war, having by his bravery and abilities obtained the rank of major-general in the army, and the decoration of the legion of bonour. Knowing that a Frenchman of the name of Count Pontes de St. Helena had died in Spain without heirs, he usurped his name and title. On his return to France after the peace, he remained in the army. In 1819 he came with his regiment to Paris, where he had been about eight or nine months, when a circumstance took place which tarnished the blushing honours of Monsieur le Comte. In a riot which took place in the streets of Paris, the general, who had always been considered a sabreur, struck an individual with the back of his sword: the man looking him in the face, at once recognised him as a brother convict at Toulon. He immediately gave information to the police, who kept a strict eye upon him, and he was discovered to be the person. Government would probably not have punished the soi-disant count for having escaped from the galleys; but the police discovered that the noble count had not forgot his old habits, as it appeared he was at the head of a band of robbers, and profiting from his easy access into houses of the first distinction, he carried on for a time his depredations even on the property of his hosts, with a dexterity that frustrated the keenest observation of the agents of the police. He had a maîtresse, whom he passed off for his sister, and who was his ac-complice in his robberies. On these fresh charges he was convicted and sentenced to the galleys at Brest for life."

Gasparini.-" At Rochefort there is a convict, a native of Italy, whose ingenuity in putting travellers under contribution might have furnished the facetious Grimaldi himself with a banditti scene in a pantomime. This hero was for some years the Turpin of France, and was much dreaded by travellers. Gasparini, though guilty of many robberies on the highway, has never been accused of wanton cruelty. He some years ago undertook alone to stop a diligence as it was passing at nightfall through a wood; here he drew up his forces, which literally consisted, not of bloody-minded robbers, but of half-a-dozen of well-stuffed coats, fixed on poles, with formidable caps, presented arms, and other appendages well suited to inspire the travellers ordered the postilion to stop; he then made ters: in the meantime, mingling personal gosthe conductor and the passengers alight, and in a resolute tone, pointing to his supposed companions, whom he had ranged on the skirts of panions, whom he had ranged on the stres of the wood, desired the trunks to be opened, out of which he took what he thought proper. He then said to the trembling travellers:—'Don't be alarmed, gentlemen; allow me to take what I require, and depend on it my troops shall not advance a step further; from them, I assure you, you have nothing to fear.' This modern Rolando was sentenced to hard labour for life in the galleys. It appeared on the trial, that when the gendarmes went to scour the wood, they were not a little surprised to find half a dozen robbers who appeared determined to stand their ground: they summoned them to surrender, and on receiving no reply, fired a volley, and then attacked the manikins aword in hand: of course they met with but feeble resistance, and laughed heartily at the joke !"

Collette, a soi-disant Bishop. - " This right reverend robber was born of poor parents, and was brought up in a convent. As a lay brother he accompanied a bishop into Italy, where he remained a considerable time. He at length quitted Italy, and contrived to make a booty of the bishop's robes, and returned to France. He passed himself off for his patron, visited several dioceses; and acted his part so well, that for a length of time he profited by his assumed holy character, and, though without revenues, managed to make a respectable appearance. He. however, fell under the suspicion of the police of Bonaparte, was arrested, and tried for forgery (having signed the name of the bishop he lived with), and was sent to the galleys for life. The following is his own account of him-self. 'I was brought up by a priest, but I cannot enter on the details of all my intrigues prior to my filling the functions of a bishop. I was led to the performance of this high character by the most extraordinary circumstances; and so long as I held this dignity I did all the good which lay in my power. I gave alms, I allowed the poor to approach me with facility. My vicars-general sometimes were dissatisfied at my liberality, as they found I became too popular. I was desirous of visiting the sick and distressed, but the chapter represented to me that I might dispense with this trouble, by reposing on its zeal and its desire to merit my benediction. These good priests were excellent courtiers; they anticipated all my wants, and even excited in my mind new desires. Finding it was so easy a burden to bear the mitre and crosier, I made my mind up to retain my post as long as it was possible.' Being asked if he found no difficulty in fulfilling all the duties attached to the ceremonies of the church, 'Not in the least,' he answered. ' always took special care to speak in a very low voice; and you know, when one is a bishop, the clergy as well as the laity find that we do every thing to admiration; and even one day that I ordained a number of young seminarists, I felt not the slightest embarrassment. My vicars, surrounding me, anticipated all that was necessary to be done by me; and, by my faith, I managed the affair very well. At night I gave a sumptuous dinner, and I can assure you that not one of my visitors even entertained an idea that I had been wanting in the solemnity. On the contrary, they praised my serious de-portment, the dignity with which I gave my benediction; nay, they even extolled my physical my, although you see it is none of the happiest.'"
We shall probably return to Mr. Goldsmith, opportunities than almost any other individual with terror. When the diligence arrived, he and a partial digest of some of his other chansip and a little, not inexcusable and certainly very characteristic, egotism with his graver matter, we must say that we have found his lucubrations both entertaining and instructive.

> The Spanish Novelists: a Series of Tales from the Earliest Periods to the Close of the Seventeenth Century. Translated from the Ori-ginals, with Biographical and Critical Notices, by Thomas Roscoe, Esq., editor of the "Italian Novelists." 3 vols. 12mo. London. 1832. Bentley.
> Mr. Roscoe has executed his laborious task > with the same judgment and ability which characterised his translations from the Italian. The tales are very various, though some of them, "The Visions of Quevedo," "The Test of Friendship," &c. &c. are already familiar to English readers. Most of the stories are too long for quotation; but the following, a Spanish John of Lynn, is of a suitable length. The cavalier in question has quite exhausted his TPAONTCPS.

"Here was a sad revolution in Don Pablo's affairs, and it proved a great hinderance to his studies, in which he had always shewn a decided predilection for the theory, in preference to the practice of the law. He imagined himself already seized and incarcerated for debt, and that he was become the jest of all the place, particularly of the students, who would be infinitely amused at the notoriety of his adventures. For this reason, he took speedy leave of his companion, and sought shelter among the shady elms and poplar-trees that skirt the banks of the river Henares, till he arrived at a little wood, in which he soon disappeared. But not yet thinking himself secure enough from the searching eye of the alguazils - suspecting even the fidelity of his late companion, he mounted into a lofty poplar, whose thick umbrageous arms completely sheltered him from public view. Having found a secure seat, he there first gave himself up to his melancholy forebodings, in which he was doomed to beguile his time until the shades of evening should afford him safer escort to proceed on his way. He was bent on flying as far as possible from Alcala and his creditors, though he felt assured they would hold him in so much respect as not to meddle with much of his substance during his absence, which he meant should continue some special long time. He now repented of his extreme folly, and prayed heartily that in future he might be endowed with grace to conduct himself with more prudence and discretion. In this perplexed state of idle repentance, weak resolutions, and hearty prayers to be released from his manifold difficulties and anxiety, he continued to ruminate some time. He was first roused by the sound of footsteps, and, looking out sharply from his concealment, he saw a well-dressed elderly man, well known to him, and a native of Alcala. His name was Rosino, a most industrious genius, who had contrived to raise himself from nothing to a respectable and even lucrative condition; for he had mar-ried his daughter to a man of letters, and established his two sons in a promising way, if they would only have turned out half as good as their father. One, however, assumed the air of a bully; the other became a gambler; and. in short, what the father had amassed by long economy and cudgelling of his brains, his hopeful sons dissipated by bringing themselves into all kinds of scrapes and excesses. The sagacious old gentleman, seeing the speed at which he was going down hill, after all his efforts in climbing up it, judged it would be wise to stop to go, without the slightest molestation. He courses; have come to some bad end; and he a little short of the bottom. 'At this rate, thought he, 'what will become of me when I am an old man'—(he was not then quite seventy)! 'My dear, blessed, and long-saving wife is dead and gone, and I can no longer keep my house together against the violence of these scape-graces: they would ruin a nation. Alas! he continued, 'they have turned it almost inside out! There is no one now that cares to lay by a single shilling - nay, by heavens, they have broken through stone walls and locks, and ran-sacked all my drawers and boxes! They have stripped me nigh to the skin. Yet why talk only of my spendthrift sons?—there is my sonin-law, a man of letters, my daughter, and ten grand-children, all as greedy as the rest; and when they come to see me, it is only for what each and all can carry away with them. I live in continued hot water. Like an old soldier on active service, I have to fight to the last, surrounded by inveterate enemies. Yes, I shall be ruined! I see it as plainly as that poplartree_(here our hero drew in his breath)_ there is nothing left for it but to steal my own money, and hide as much of it as I can get! In this way the old man went on lamenting himself, much to the edification of the student; at the same time proceeding to count out of a large yellow bag, one by one, a thousand crowns in hard gold. He had come to the resolution of concealing them in the thickest part of the wood, where no wicked relations would have any further chance of finding them. So, cautiously wrapping them up in a cat-skin, which he had prepared for the purpose, in order the better to secure and protect them, he set to work to find an appropriate bank for their safe deposit. With this view, he approached the identical tree on which he had before fixed his eyes for an apt illustration of his hard case, and from whose venerable branches Don Pablo had contemplated the whole proceeding. With his usual caution, the old merchant looked earnestly round him, on every side and in finding all safe and quiet, he took from his pocket a large garden-knife, and with singular dexterity began to excavate a little savings' hank at the foot of the tree. He first made some neat incisions in the green turf, which he carefully removed, and then hollowed out the earth till he had made a reasonably sized aperture, when he stopt and breathed a little from his labours. Next he took the gold, which after wistfully gazing at some moments, he still more carefully deposited in the hole, observing, at the same time: 'Heaven defend THIS at least from all evil hands; as Heaven knows it is done with good intent, to befriend a poor man in his old days, instead of his being driven to beg alms from door to door, besides saving a mass or two for his soul when he is gone, which I doubt his own sons would never have the grace to see done!' Saying these words, he proceeded to replace the earth, and refix the sward exactly in the manner he had found them. Moreover, that he might be at no loss to recognise the precise spot where he had deposited his trensure, he carved with the same knife in the bark of the said tree the following letters in large capitals, such as we see used for grand inscriptions at our cathedrals:—' HERE.' He then looked very complacently around him, as if congratulating himself on his providential la ours; and returned, well satisfied with the security of his money, to rejoin his friends at he should perhaps never have thought of pray-Alcala. Meantime Don Pablo, intent on all ing for his reformation; that consequently that had passed, permitted the old gentleman Don Pablo would have gone on in his old As we are neither of the flippant, critical, even maintained his seat till evening; but then he descended from his aerial station, and forthwith began to repeat the same operation which the old man had shortly before concluded. He guessed so well, that he hit at once upon the hidden treasure, which he began to count at his leisure, and found it amounted to not less than five hundred. But the night having set in, Don Pablo was at a loss to make out whether the precious pieces were doubloons, reals, crowns, or penny-pieces. It was his good for-tune, however, to find that the whole consisted of doubloons; and as to reconciling his conscience to carry them away with him, though he had some qualms, he consoled himself with the mental reservation, that he would certainly one day restore them, when somewhat less inconvenient to him than just at present. He then proceeded smartly on his way, after first inscribing, by way of rejoinder upon the tree, under the emphatic word HERE, the following couplets :-

' Here came one who could not see The man who saw him from this tree; May fortune grant, ere long he may The money that was stolen repay.'

"All this led Don Pablo seriously to reflect: next to repent of his errors; then to resolve, and upon good resolutions to lay the foundation of a reformed life. He grew discreet, studied hard, and avoided all undue extravagance and display. Indeed, he applied the remainder of his time at the University to such good purpose, that he rose high in credit with all classes. He succeeded so well in his profession, that in a short period he was raised to the decretal, chair in the University, and was in no want of the approbation and patronage of men of rank the reputation of a distinguished pleader, and formed a union with the daughter of a man of great landed property, so as to assure him a fixed rank and station among the chief families of Alcala. It was now Don Pablo had leisure to think of the good turn which a certain old gentleman named Rosino had once served him. as we have seen. As bound in honour, as well as in conscience, he immediately restored not only the capital with the entire interest, but did every thing to forward the interests of his family, and to oblige him in every respect. And true it was, as the old gentleman had pre-dicted it would ensue from his graceless sons, although they had paid the forfeit. He found him begging his way from door to door; one of his sons had died, and the other met with the accident of being hanged. Moreover, he assured Don Pablo, it was a wonder he had not said inscription upon the tree. He would certainly have hanged himself from one of its branches, but for the consolatory tenor of the last line, which held out a sort of promise of restitution. Upon this single hope he had ever since lived, and never ceased to pray, and weary Heaven that the thief might be forgiven and permitted to prosper, in order the sooner to be enabled to clear his conscience by refunding the whole sum with interest, as early as convenient. To these prayers, indeed, the old man attributed Don Pablo's sudden reformation and subsequent success; and he often declared, that unless the borrower had been bonourable enough to leave his note of hand upon the tree, himself, without Heaven's help, never have seen his money more.'

There are contained in this series, "Lazarillo de Tormes" and "Gusmand Alfarache," the foundations of "Gil Blas;" but never were models so improved. They contain only the ingenious tricks of the rogue and the mendicant; but Le Sage's work is an epic epigram (if we may use the expression) on all human nature.

The Narrative of a Journey and Visit to the Metropolis of France; embracing, together with a few Incidental Reflections, a General Description and Historical Account of the Principal Places, Public Edifices, and other Remarkable Objects, which render so attractive that much-frequented and interesting Capital. By George Clayton, jun. 12mo. pp. 95. London, 1832. Clayton.

WE once, in days of yore, enjoyed, and we believe produced, a good deal of amusement out of a volume which told of a worthy lord mayor's voyage to Oxenford, to the no small delight of his literary chaplain, who preserved the memory of that great undertaking in a volume never to be forgotten so long as the Mansion House stands, or civic deeds (from John Gilpin downwards) can claim the public applause. We know not if the neighbourhood be infectious; but certes, since the Rev. Mr. Dillon's work, we have seen no performance of any thing like equal merit till we perused the Narrative of George Clayton, jun., of No. 134, Cheapside.

Mr. Clayton, junior, is a conqueror in travelling: his modest epigraph is "Veni, vidi, dash thus - !" but, in the midst of his glory, and influence. In a very brief period he be. dash thus ——!" but, in the midst of his glory, came both honoured and wealthy; acquired he displays a charming trait of filial affection, for his book is thus inscribed:-

"To
Mrs. John Clayton,
In obedience to whose request
The following Narrative was expressly prepared,
And is now Most respectfully presented,
As the sincere, though inadequate expression of Filial affection, gratitude, and esteem, By her Dutiful and attached Son, G sorge."

Could the mother of the Gracchi have more cause for exultation?

We next learn, by a Preface, that this is a second edition, which is ventured by the author under the sanction of a confident assurance that his little book will again meet with indulgence," &c. &c.

The Preface is followed by an Apology, and the Apology by an Introduction (for though himself died when he returned to claim his this magnum opus is only of ninety-five pages, secret treasure, and instead of it found only the there is nothing wanting of a perfect book); said inscription upon the tree. He would cer- with the particulars of which we beg to make our readers acquainted. And, first, of the Apology:

"To satisfy (says Mr. Clayton, jun.) the anticipated interrogation of some who, probably, will inquire from what motive or for what purpose the ensuing narrative was printed, the writer, by way of reply, begs respectfully to state, that its publication may be truly affirmed to have originated in obedient compliance to the renewed and repeated desire of several friends who requested its perusal, and the un-disguised declaration of which he sincerely and deferentially hopes will prove sufficient to disarm flippant Criticism of her ungracious stricremarks must be the reverse of ungracious strictures or unbeseeming effrontery. In truth, we love Mr. Clayton and his journal, written, as he benevolently explains, "at subsequent periods of time"—not all at once, "and in detached portions"—not all together; and which he presents "to the perusal of the reader with much humble diffidence and concomitant dissatisfaction." But, moreover, to "disrobe" unbeseeming effrontery it was, he adds, "entirely prepared during those interstices of time which were not filled up with the absorbent occupation of mercantile engagements-indited from the imperfect reminiscences of a defective and rather oblivious memory—and drawn up at a season when, if not entirely obliterated, the vividness of impression had, in a great measure, considerably abated; for it will not be controverted, he presumes, that impression is a kind of inspiration highly necessary, and exceedingly helpful to infuse vivacity or impart a relevancy to those descriptions, in which are portrayed those objects, the spectacle of which was very likely to produce a varied and forcible effect upon the mind of the observer of them. Therefore, he is readily inclined to believe that his delineations will appear much after the same infelicitous condition with those of the unaided effusions of an uninspired and uninitiated scribbler, whose thoughts had never been impregnated by a draught from the sacred stream that laves the fabled mount of Helicon; or favoured with the requisite afflatus or impulses of the august and venerated Nine; and whom genius, in fiction, has ever been wont to invoke as the dispensers of inspiration, as the infusers of wisdom, and as the beneficent and befriending patronesses of all who, in this manner, beseech their auspicious favour.

To which, as Sancho Panza wisely sayeth, "there can be no reply." We pass over the introduction, which is nathless a fine specimen of the Claytonian style, and come at once to the important journey, when, " every necessary arrangement having been made and properly adjusted, in company with his father, mother, brother, and a friend, the narrator took his departure from Finsbury, on Monday, the 10th of August, 1829, at ten o'clock P.M., for Brighton, towards the accomplishment of the purpose as noted in the foregoing paragraph, and from which fashionable and much-frequented town, as a watering-place, some of the above party were to take ship for the French

mon-place.

" Before our departure, for some hours previously, the weather was exceedingly stormy, but about ten o'clock the rain began to abate, and by eleven entirely ceased, and the re-mainder of the day became very dry, fine, warm, and favourable for travelling. After a very agreeable ride of about seven hours, we arrived in the town of Brighton by five o'clock in the afternoon, and lodged for the night in the very commodious and pleasantly situated hotel, called the White Horse.'

The embarkation and voyage are touchingly described.

" Tuesday, the 11th of August .- The necessary preparations having been made, (in company with Mr. S. H , who unexpectedly joined us the preceding evening,) we proceeded to the pier, from whence we were to embark on the steam-vessel bound for the French port of Dieppe. Amongst the spectators upon the face, extending laterally from the cheek-bone pier, awaiting the departure of the ship, we beyond the back of the head, and perpendicu-nor the forbidding presumptuous school, our recognised many friends, both from the me-remarks must be the reverse of ungracious tropolis, as well as from different parts of the country. Eight o'clock A.M. having arrived, the signal was given, by the firing of a small cannon, for the departure of the vessel. As the pier receded from our view, we bade adieu to our friends by the waving of our hats and the customary motion of our hands, whilst in spirit, and by ejaculatory prayer, we com-mended them to the protecting guardianship and all-sufficient grace of an Almighty God, by whom life given is preserved; and from whom, as the ' Author of every good and perfect gift, every blessing in providence and grace is immediately derived. The day was sunny and cloudless; the sea was beautiful and calm; the company numerous, orderly, and agreeable. Our father was very soon afflicted with that truly painful, disagreeable, and obnoxious visitation, sea-sickness; and from which, during the whole passage, he suffered most severely.

Mr. H—— proved himself a good sailor, not even altering a hue in the colour of his complexion. Brother William and myself were occasionally annoyed with emetic sensations. After a most pleasant, though rather prolonged passage of eleven hours, we doubled the harbour of Dieppe by seven o'clock P.M. At the distance of about four furlongs from the port we fired a cannon, which was presently acknowledged by a French pilot entering on board our vessel, and who, according to his usual practice, steered our ship into the basin of the harbour. The pier, which projected several hundred feet from the harbour, was crowded with spectators of every class, who had assembled to observe our entrance into the port; and the sight which they presented to our view was not more singular than interesting, in that pretty and variegated appearance which was produced by the various and differently-coloured dresses of the females, who chiefly composed the throng. As soon as the vessel approached sufficiently near for the passeugers to disembark, several gens d'armes instantly came forward, demanded our passports, inspected our coats, supervised our baggage, and examined our entire persons. After we had undergone the requisite and customary ordeal, or scrutiny, we hastened to Taylor's hotel, where we tarried till ten o'clock the following morning. Our father, who had become quite a valetudinarian in consequence of excessive sea-sickness, retired immediately to his couch; Mr. H——, William, and myself partook of a late tea, which also included supper. In the dusk of the evening we perambulated the streets of Dieppe for the space of about two hours."

We do not know whether it is meant to insinuate that "our father" included Mr. H. in the family line; but if Mr. H. should write his tour, and dedicate it to his mother, we promise to take an interest in the delicate inquiry. Next morning the party mustered in almost undiminished force; for Mr. C. says-

"Personally we felt greatly refreshed and recruited by the re-invigorating slumbers of nocturnal repose, excepting our father, who still remained an invalid, arising from the sickness which the preceding day's aquatic expedition had brought on.'

An account of Dieppe follows, from which we learn, that " the inhabitants are rather populous," and that " the females wear no bonnets, but in lieu of them, large linen caps, of a conical shape, and expansive magnitude, with huge flaps hanging down on each side of their larly, in height, above the pericranium a foot; and downwards, in depth, as low as the shoulders."

Among his other surveys, Mr. Clayton, who is a red-hot anti-catholic, went to matins at St. Jaques, where he saw "the priest genuflecting and gesticulating before a crucifix en-chased in silver, in the centre of seven candlesticks of the same metal, and presenting altogether a spectacle exceedingly unseemly, horrible, and pagan, muttering the prayers in a tone utterly inaudible."

Having got their provisional passports, our daring and adventurous countrymen set out in a diligence for Paris; and of these vehicles

Mr. C. remarks:

"The diligences are the most extraordinary voitures, or coaches, that can possibly be imagined, and which I can only compare to a sort of three-bodied fly-waggon, which for clumsiness, magnitude, incommodiousness, and inclasticity, would surprise even to amusement, the stranger, when he first beholds them; whilst every English passenger pronounced them most execrable conveyances.

Many things excited the wonder and risibility of the intelligent travellers; and Mr. Clayton puts on the Cockney character to perfection in painting some of these oddities.

Respecting the boots of the postilion," he humorously remarks, "the nearest comparison that I can make is, to a japanned chimney-pot, surmounted by a cow reversed, with its top downwards, and answering by way of receptacle for the foot. The difference consists in the lustre of the chimney-pot when compared with the dirty and dingy appearance of these exceedingly curious boots. This strange spectacle was an irresistible provocative to laughter, and incentive to merriment; for only picture to yourself the grotesque figure of the posti-lion, and the deplorable condition of the halfstarved and infirm quadrupeds, and the still more singular intertexture of the harness by which they were attached to the diligence, and propelled along by the unremitting flagellation and merciless coercion of the sanguinary

How one must have laughed! But our author's observations upon French farming are of a more philosophical kind, and we strenuously recommend them to our agriculturists.

"One striking peculiarity in the mode of French farming is, that the sheaves of grain are placed with their ears downwards upon the ground, and then tied at the top with a small band of straw, which give them a pyramidical form, and rather mean appearance - a mode which differs considerably, both in shape, aspect, and elegance, from the English method of gathering up the sheaf. Whether the English method is preferable to the French I cannot pretend to determine. The reason adduced by the French farmers for this peculiar construction of their sheaves is, that the ears of grain may not be moistened by the showers of rain; and provided the rain did never descend violently, or remain long in its continuance, the reason might carry with it some validity and concludency; but should the pluvial torrent precipitate strongly, and that for several hours of many successive days, so as to penetrate to the base of the sheaf, I apprehend the ears would be likely to suffer damage, to germinate or corrupt; at all events, and in all probability, they would contract an earthy taste, with the concomitancy of a disagreeable effluvium, to say nothing of the maturing rays of the sun, which assuredly, is one great advantage obtained by the method which the English far-sun's ripening influence.'

This comparison is almost enough to set the farmers of the two countries by "the ears."

At Rouen, our traveller, strange to say, found the church of St. Omer !! which is equal to our Lady of Loretto's miraculous flight any day. The cooking at the hotel was not to his taste, and he had a " mealless dinner," but made up a little by ordering tea and coffee for supper; and set off at 10 P.M. for the capital, while "Morpheus presided over nature, sound asleep." Here Mr. C. jun. becomes exquisitely poetical; he says, or rather sings, with all the pathos of a Petrarch — "The fair moon, taking her nocturnal promenade along the cloudless azure and stellar canopy of heaven, walked in all the soft resplendency of her highest and brightest glory the very night, according to the fictions, tales, and romance of imagination's fantastic record, as would have suited a melancholic pensiveness, a sentimental solitude, a chivalrous spirit, bent on some Quixotic deed of brave adventure just the night for maid and swain to woo and whisper love,—a night, in fine, singularly con-genial to those meditative reflections, and that peculiar, inexplicable, romantic, and musing order of phantasy, or impression, or feeling, which give to

' airy nothings
A local habitation and a name.'"

Arrived at Paris, where the separation of the passengers at the Bureau, " forcibly reminding one of that notable event recorded in Genesis, of the confusion, and consequent dispersion, which took place amongst the confederated builders of the tower of Babel, in the plain of Hotel des Princes. The dinner here was equally disagreeable to Mr. C., and the party were intruded upon by an impudent German, who had been their fellow-voyager from Brighton to Dieppe, and who "offered (says Mr. C.) to conduct us to various places, and manifold sights, which he imagined demanded our observance; more particularly to conduct us to the theatres, and other haunts which he specified, of profligate frequentation;" upon which the finest moral reflection is made: "The occurrence of this circumstance taught me an important and admonitory lesson, and forcibly impressed me respecting the necessity of the precaution in future, to be very careful of manifesting too great a degree of unrequired civility, or apparent friendship (which, per-haps, we had too freely shewn towards this German), to any stranger, of whose character, habits, or life, previously, nothing could be known

Our intelligent friend now proceeded, with all his activity, and might, and main, to inspect the lions of Paris. The Bourse pleased him much; at the Louvre he saw a valuable collection of paintings after the old masters, from different parts of the world; and beautiful marble statues, &c. produced by the Grecian, Roman, and Athenian chisel: at the museum of the Jardin des Plantes, he was astonished to discover that the building was divided into floors, and these again subdivided into rooms. The second day is almost more prolific of strange matters. "The foundation of the Hôtel des Invalides alone measures seventeen acres of ground;" and the warriors domiciled there eny every attention which their bodily infirmities require, given to them by the "Sour de la mers adopt in the exposure of theirs to the | Charité, or nurses;" while the church, we are appearance of George Clayton, jun.; and the assured, is " for the worship of the invalids." particular about certain cabinets near the Palais Royal, the like of which we never read in any preceding tourist. The Café de la Paix, reciprocities of domestic health—those affable, he tells us, is "in the form of a semicrular lovely, and amiable charities of parent, brother, oval, with haunts of human depravity, in sister, friend—in the departure or absence of which, alas! are exercised every species of licentious profligacy. But it is time," he prudently adds, "to dismiss the description of this too fascinating and voluptuous spot."

We need not go through all the extraordinary sights seen by our curious and inquisitive kind." countryman. Inter alia, he saw the whale we have since had exhibited at Charing Cross; his lucubrations upon which are equally original, plous, and sublime. "For what," says he, "thought I, could man do, if conspired against by leviathans, the slightest brandish of whose A. Fraser, and containing two of the Chrotails would instantly submerge the largest argosy; from whose nostrils seas playfully fountain forth; and whose leaps of frolicsome sport detached stories, which first appeared in the do cause even the very oceans to undulate.

Unluckily time did not allow him and William to visit "the Militaire l'Ecole;" and we made extremely interesting at this moment must therefore content ourselves with quoting from an introduction, which was written by his admirable remarks on a more general topic _the fair.

" Most of the females in Paris wear no bonnets, this part of dress being used more as a distinction of rank. By the inferior orders the bonnet is never worn; by the intermediate classes very seldom; but by the higher ranks invariably. Of the higher classes of Parisians the writer cannot speak in those terms of unqualified and commendatory admiration which have been so frequently pronounced in his indulge most of the tastes which a retired per-Shinar," only allowed them to escape to the hearing; but, perhaps he had not the requisite opportunity that would enable him to pass a correct judgment; for neither his sentiments nor time would permit him to frequent their theatres, mingle in their circles of gaiety, or pay nocturnal visits to their most splendid cafés. Of those whom he saw walking about the streets, boulevards, gardens, promenades, and parks, their complexions were neither so healthy, their features so comely, their waists so slender, their figure so elegant, their persons so fine, or their attire so becoming or genteel, as those who constitute that class commonly planted, and was considered by myself, as by styled the beau monds of English fashionables.

August 21.--We have to congratulate the world on the safe arrival of the author and his friends at Dover; having spent eight days in mercial establishments, with which my fortunes becoming so intimately acquainted with the had long been bound up, to the extent of no kingdom and capital of France. How delight-less a sum than one hundred and twenty thou-ful is the prospect of home after such a length sand pounds. The author having, however of absence, and such adventures! Once more rashly, committed his pledges thus largely to at Brighton: "With the Devil's Dyke the hazards of trading companies, it behoved writer was highly gratified; he considered it him, of course, to abide the consequences of his one of the lovliest, grandest, and most para-disiacal of nature's glowing landscapes that he rendered on the instant every shred of property had ever gazed upon.

This volume, adorned by two engravings after nicles of the Canongate, viz. the Highland Widow and the Two Drovers, and also three Keepsake (my Aunt Margaret's Mirror, the Tapestried Chamber, and the Laird's Jock), is Sir Walter Scott, and is dated at Abbotsford, on his birth-day, the 15th of August, 1831, before he set out for Naples, and from which we copy the following:

"I have, perhaps, said enough on former occasions of the misfortunes which led to the dropping of that mask under which I had, for a long series of years, enjoyed so large a por-tion of public favour. Through the success of those literary efforts, I had been enabled to son of my station might be supposed to entertain. In the pen of this nameless romancer, I seemed to possess something like the secret fountain of coined gold and pearls vouchsafed to the traveller of the eastern tale; and no doubt believed that I might venture, without silly imprudence, to extend my personal expenditure considerably beyond what I should have thought of, had my means been limited to the competence which I derived from inheritance, with the moderate income of a professional situation. I bought, and built, and the rest of the world, in the safe possession of an easy fortune. My riches, however, like the other riches of this world, were liable to accidents, under which they were ultimately obligations. Also, politically, the Parisians not spare the market of literature; and the are in a miserable condition, being highly in- sudden ruin that fell on so many of the booksellers, could scarcely have been expected to leave unscathed one whose career had of necesrectionary spirit was fearfully effervescing in sity connected him deeply and extensively with monition, I found myself involved in the sweeping catastrophe of the unhappy time, and called on to meet the demands of creditors upon comwhich he had been accustomed to call his own. were combined with all possible liberality and kindness of disposition, and who readily afforded every assistance towards the execution of plans, in the success of which the author contemplated the possibility of his ultimate extrication, and which were of such a nature, that, had assistance of this sort been withheld, he could have had little prospect of carrying them into effect. Among other resources which occurred, was the project of that complete and corrected edition of his Novels and Romances, (whose real parentage had of necessity been disclosed at the moment of the commercial convulsions alluded to,) which has now advanced with unprecedented favour nearly to its close; but as he purposed also to continue, for the behoof of those to whom he was indebted, the exercise of his pen in the same path of literawhich he put forth after the paternity of the 'Waverley Novels' had come to be publicly ascertained: and though many of the partiand notes to some of the preceding volumes of the present collection, it is now reprinted as it stood at the time, because some interest is generally attached to a coin or medal struck on a special occasion, as expressing, perhaps, more faithfully than the same artist could have afterwards conveyed, the feelings of the moment that gave it birth."

The preface of October 1827 is reprinted. and the author continues: -

"Such was the little narrative which I thought proper to put forth in October 1827; nor have I much to add to it now. About to appear for the first time in my own name in this department of letters, it occurred to me that something in the shape of a periodical publication might carry with it a certain air of novelty, and I was willing to break, if I may so express it, the abruptness of my personal forthcoming, by investing an imaginary coad-jutor with at least as much distinctness of individual existence as I had ever previously thought it worth while to bestow on shadows of the same convenient tribe. Of course, it had never been in my contemplation to invite the assistance of any real person in the sustaining of my quasi-editorial character and labours. It had long been my opinion, that any thing like a literary pic-nic is likely to end in suggesting comparisons, justly termed odious, and therefore to be avoided: and, indeed. I had also had some occasion to know, that promises of assistance, in efforts of that order, are apt to be more magnificent than the subsequent performance. I therefore planned a Miscellany, to be dependent, after the old fashion, on my own resources alone; and although conscious enough that the moment which assigned to the Author of Waverley 'a local habitation and a name,' had seriously endangered his spell, I felt inclined to adopt the sentiment of my old hero Montrose, and to say to myself, that in literature as in war,

' He either fears his fate too much, Or his deserts are small, Who dares not put it to the touch, To win or lose it alk'

This is a very caustic and clever piece of lisle, and seldom mentioned the venerable controversial criticism upon a review in the judge's charge to the jury without shedding Quarterly, which Lord Nugent assumes to down features, carrying rather a sarcastic, or the arguments are borne out by facts; and almost a cynical expression. As we in our humbler sphere, of stating impartially rather than criticising opi-nionatively, have held the balance even in regard to Lord Nugent's and Mr. D'Israeli's publications touching this important era of our history, we shall now only quote, as an example from this little pamphlet, a sort of paraphrase of Dr. Parr's celebrated philippic against Sir James Mackintosh.

"What remains of Mr. Southey's article is mere abuse-terms partaking of that figure of speech called balderdash; such as 'macradicalised whig,' 'lamentably bewhigged,' 'party pleader,' and the like. Now, my dear Murray, nicknames are full as bad evidence of good reasoning as of good manners. And, as for mere thundering invective, that is a weapon which every pleasing variety as regards the number and easy for me to say this: There are imputations more injurious and more lasting than that of radicalism or whiggery. A small Edition of English Botany : containing the Plants of Great Britain, arranged according to the Linnaan Method, and briefly described. C. E. Sowerby.

"OFFERED to the public with a view of meeting the general demand for such cheap publications as may tend to encourage a fondness for scientific and healthful pursuits amongst the less opulent classes." The original work by Sir James Edward Smith and James Sowerby, Esq. is well known; but its price puts it out of the reach of many persons to whom nevertheless botany would prove a very pleasing study. We wish this abridgment, which is very neatly executed, and which is to appear in monthly numbers, all the success it deserves.

Family Classical Library. Vol. XXXIV. pp. 332. London, 1832. Valpy. THE first volume of Euripides, Potter's translation; and containing the Bacchæ, Ion, Alcestis, Medea, Hippolytus, and the Phonician Virgins. In every respect this volume resembles its acceptable precursors.

Book of the Constitution, with the Reform Bills. Abridged. By Thomas Stephen, author of "the History of the Reformation in Scotland." 12mo. pp. 422. Edinburgh, 1832, Stephens and Co.; London, Smith, Elder, and Co.

A most useful constitutional epitome, and one for reference to the present time which cannot be too much commended. Electors, candidates, and indeed every citizen, is interested in the matters here very plainly set forth.

NOTES ON COMETS.

The Comet of Biela. — This comet was discovered on the 27th of February, 1826, by afterwards observed at most of the European observatories. On determining the elements of this comet, it was soon found that these had a great resemblance to comets which had appeared in the years 1772 and 1805; a closer investigation proved the identity of the three. An anomaly, however, appeared in the period of revolution, which, in one of its returns, was completed in 2460 days, and in the other 2469 days; this inequality was found to be owing to the action of the planet Jupiter, near which the comet had passed in the years 1782, 1794, and 1807; allowing for these perturbations, and a similar influence in May 1831, the following are the elements, as calculated by M. Damoiseau :-

Passage of the perihelion, 1832, November 27 4808, Paris mean time, reckoning from attraction of Jupiter for several months, and, been thus acquired; and some have conjectured that the ring of Saturn has been formed by the by the swiftness of the rotation of Saturn.

The nodes of the comet of 1744 were within half a degree of the nodes of Mercury; but there was the difference of about a week between the times of these bodies coming to their respective nodes: when they were nearest each other, the comet was distant from the planet a fifth-part of the distance of the earth from the sun, and almost twice as near to the sun as Mercury was: the magnitude of the comet was judged to be at least equal to that of the earth; it was more luminous than Sirius, the brightest star in the heavens. On the 8th of February, it equalled Jupiter in brightness, and some days after it did not yield in splendour to Venus; its tail extended 16° from its body, and in length about twenty millions of miles: at the commencement of March it was seen by several persons one hour after the sun had passed the meridian. From the calculated places of Mercury agreeing with the observed places, it was found that this comet had no effect on the planet.

According to some German philosophers, the equilibrium of the atmosphere was disturbed by the comet of 1811, the effects of which are continued to the present time. This comet, however, never entered the earth's orbit, its perihelion distance being 1.0354445, and its nearest approach to the earth was forty-seven millions of leagues. These philosophers state, that its appearance in 1811 was immediately succeeded by several years of thunder, wind, rain, earthquakes, and volcanic eruptions, particularly occurring in Southern Asia; at the extreme of the wet period, the cholera broke M. Biela, at Josephstadt, appearing as a small round nebulosity; it was seen 9th March following by M. Gambart, at Marseilles, and indicative of a disturbed electricity acting in a particular direction, and by its influence encircling the globe as with a zone of death and desolation! May we not hope that the visit of the comet of 1832 will neutralise the baleful influence attributed to its bright precursor of 18112

> Sir Isaac Newton suspected that the spirit which makes the finest, subtilest, and best part of our air, and which is absolutely requisite for the life and being of all things, is derived principally from comets; the vapour of which might spread itself over the planets that should be near enough, and be of use in restoring to them that humidity they incessantly lose. Dr. Halley was of opinion that instead of occasioning fatal catastrophes, the meeting with comets might be productive of new wonders and things useful to our earth.

Mercury frequently completes his course round the sun without being observed, owing to his close proximity to the solar rays; the same invisibility may often occur with comets entrance on the plane of the elliptic, that a courses during a long succession of cloudy portion of its immense nebulosity would have weather. Some comets also, from their nature, mingled itself with our terrestrial atmosphere, are probably unfit to reflect sufficient light to and been detained by the attraction of the our earth, to render them visible. These earth; the comet itself would probably have causes must have combined very remarkably in been arrested for a time, in the same way that the case of the comet of Biela, unless it be a the one of 1770 was kept within the powerful new formation, as the place of its node is so very near the earth's path. If its existence like the same remarkable body, have the ele- and path be coeval with the creation of the ments of its orbit deranged, leaving those of world,—that is, unless it is a new formation, our planet unaffected. It is suspected that the or a comet diverged from a different course, it immense atmospheres of the asteroids have must have crossed and re-crossed the earth's orbit more than seventeen hundred times since the creation of the world! The only visits on immense nebulosity of a comet, attracted by record in which it can be identified are 1772, the planet, and thrown off in a series of zones 1805, 1826, and 1832. Its period is six years and three quarters, and its place of aphelion a little beyond the orbit of Jupiter.

At the distance of the moon, the comet of Biela would appear with a diameter twenty times greater than our satellite; were it not for its pellucid nature, it would afford a better explanation of the darkness at the crucifixion than a solar eclipse, to which some have ascribed it, the total darkness of which could not have continued more than four or five minutes. Were a comet in its perigee to come between the earth and sun, and be moving the same way with the earth, it would cause a darkness much more intense, as well as of a longer duration, than what would take place in any solar eclipse.

In the forty-third year before the Christian era a comet was seen by day, and considered by the Romans as the metamorphosed soul of Julius Cæsar, who had been assassinated a short time before. It was observed for several days rising about five in the evening, and shining with uncommon brightness. It was called Julium Sidus; and in commemoration of the prodigy a star was placed at the head of Casar's statue. The same comet is believed to have returned in the years 532, 1106, and 1680, and that its period is about 575 years. A celebrated cosmogonist considered this comet to be closely connected with the destinies of our world, - that it communicated a rotation to our planet at the creation by striking it obliquely — that it produced the deluge by enveloping the earth in its tail — and that it will ultimately wrap it in flames at the final consummation of all things.

In 1402 there appeared two very remarkable comets; the first so brilliant, that in March the light of the sun at mid-day did not prevent its being visible. The second appeared in June, and was seen a long time before sunset. It was pretended that this comet announced the approaching death of Jean Galeas Visconti: this prince, who had got his horoscope calculated in youth, was so struck with the appearance of this comet, that the fear incident upon this no doubt contributed to realise this prediction.

The brightest comet in the recollection of the present generation was the large and beautiful one that continued so long visible in the autumn of 1811. The influences attributed to this brilliant stranger are as varied as absurd; its supposed influence on the vintage of France is still perpetuated by the celebrated "comet wine:" according to a writer in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1813, it had an effect, not merely on the harvest, to ripen the corn, but to communicate an unusual deliciousness to figs, melons, and wall-fruit; it exterminated the wasps for that season, deprived the flies of

The comet of 1811 was supplane,—if descending at right angles to the posed to have slied an auspicious influence on sun, the comet sees the whole system spread the overbearing power of tyranny and oppresthe birth of the young Napoleon, and also to out beneath, and presenting a most sublime have been the baneful star that lured his appearance.

A comet retreats so far from the sun that with the professions connected with it, under Napoleon was expostulated with by his uncle, at its remotest point it must seem as a solitary Cardinal Fesch, who expressed his belief that wanderer amidst the firmament of fixed stars, he must one day sink under the weight of that all planetary bodies having disappeared long universal hatred with which his actions were before it had reached its aphelion; the sun surrounding the throne, Buonaparte led the shines with diminished brilliancy, and with a cardinal to the window, opened it, and pointing upwards, said, "Do you see yonder star?" comet of 1680 has an astonishing variety of four months in the year 1825, and yet that he is stationed passes into the full effulgence of year is not remarkable for any meteorological the solar glory, and bathes amidst its rephenomena: the comet of 1811, at the height splendent lustre; in its retreat, he ascends as a light equal to the one-tenth part of that we Mercury and the whole train of planets, leaves a light equal to the one-tenth part of that we receive from the full moon. The rays of this comet were concentrated to the focus of the beneath, and glides away till the whole of largest lens, and acted on the blackened bulb of these have quenched their brightness in the of the thermometer, and yet no sensible effect distance, and the sun's light itself has sunk was produced. It appears from a comparison into the subdued splendour of surrounding drawn from a table of comets, recorded as visible between the years 837 and 1819, that twenty-four comets have passed between the sun and the orbit of Mercury, thirty-three between the orbits of Mercury and Venus, twenty-one between the orbits of Venus and the earth, sixteen between the orbits of the earth and Mars, three between the orbits of Mars and the asteroids, and one between the orbits of the asteroids and Jupiter. The number of comets actually observed is about five hundred, but the whole number that traverse the system is supposed to amount not merely to thousands but to millions! This statement seems too vast for credibility; but a rigid calculation intimates that there are millions of comets whose perihelia are within the orbit of Uranus; and we have no reason to doubt but that there are many whose perihelion distance is without the orbit of this remote planet!

Some conjecture that comets are appointed to demolish decaying planets, or to supply them again with materials for building them anew; others that they are so many hells to punish the damned with perpetual vicissitudes of heat and cold. We should rather incline to consider them the most glorious abodes in the solar system; if comets are tenanted with intellectual beings, they have doubtless the most splendid observatories for the contemplation of the wonders of the celestial canopy that can possibly be conceived, infinitely surpassing all aspects of the heavens as beheld from the planets, or even the solar orb itself. A comet, on its return to the sun, if moving in nearly the same plane with the orbits of the planets, combines all the diversities of the starry heavens that are peculiar to each planet, with every other possible variety resulting from a change of position. Returning from the fields of space, it slowly approaches the outer planetary orbits, surveys the system of Uranus, soars over the stupendous apparatus of Saturn, and sees the orb, rings, and satellites in their beautiful concentric arrangement; if detained (as was the comet of 1770) among the moons this view is on the supposition that the applane,-if descending at right angles to the Five comets appeared within the compass of dwindled to a point! the glowing orb on which Uranus at an immense distance behind and stars.

The revolutions of some comets are completed in much less time than, a few years since, was supposed; the comet of 1682, whose period is 75 years, was termed by Dr. Halley "the Mercury of comets." The following are some of the most remarkable; the comets of Encke, Biela, and Halley, are the only three whose returns have been satisfactorily verified: — Comet of Encke, 3½ years; comet of Biela, 6½ years; comet of 1770, 50 years, 5½ years, and 20 years (having had its original period disturbed by the action of Jupiter); comet of 1815, 74 or 75 years; comet of Halley, 75 or 76 years; (this comet is expected to return the latter end of the year 1835); comet of 1680, 575 years; second comet of 1811, 875 years; comet of 1769, 929 years; comet of 1807, 1713 years; first comet of 1811, 3782 years; comet of 1811, 3782 yea 3383 years; and the comet of 1763,7334 years. Though vast to the finite mind, the numbers, periods, and distances of comets, what are they but a drop in the ocean of infinity! a point What are in the abyss of eternal duration! thousands of years and millions of wandering bodies, but the duration of the splendour of a dew-drop before it is exhaled! There is time for all these movements in the countless ages of eternity, and there is space for all these revo-lutions in the ample dominions of the universe of God.

KING'S COLLEGE.

THE academical session in the medical department of this promising institution was resumed on Monday, when Professor Green delivered a lecture, introductory to the whole course, before a crowded assemblage of medical pupils, as well as members of the profession and men of science. The lecturer opened his discourse by giving a brief outline of the origin of the learned pursuits, which, he contended, were founded upon a close and happy union of the sciences; without which, indeed, he argued, siastics in the earlier ages, became absolutely a matter of national consideration.

He next proceeded to trace their progress to Greece and Rome, where, in consequence of the weight of a system of military despotism. Beneath the genial glow of freedom, they were again revived, and, being stripped of their external mummeries, began to assume a more consistent and intelligent character, which the

The pro-fessor then adverted to the inventions of the compass, the telescope, and the art of printing, as having opened a new era in scientific pursuits, and given to mankind the means of practical investigation and experience, without which nothing effectual was to be accomplished.

He mentioned the immortal Harvey as the most distinguished early anatomist; and in medicine, Boerhaave, Stahl, and Hoffmann, partook largely of his eulogiums.

The latter of these great physicians he regarded, he said, less perhaps for his superior genius than for his sagacity in applying his science to the living body, in the practice of what was useful to man, and founded on experience alone. Of the great John Hunter, who had introduced the important study of comparative anatomy upon the same unerring principles, he spoke in terms of the highest admiration. The learned professor particularly dilated upon the necessity and paramount importance of intimately blending the sciences with all the professions, without which none could succeed; and inveighed, in energetic language, against the vile practices of empirics and unprincipled pretenders to science, who could not be sufficiently reprobated or discarded from the profession.

Finally, he spoke with much respect of the two great Universities of Oxford and Cambridge; and, in drawing a comparison between them and the present metropolitan establishments, assigned to each its respective degrees of merit, according to its local situa-tion, and the objects for which it had been instituted.

The professor concluded his long and highly interesting discourse by strongly recommending the close and cordial union of all the professions, so intimately connected as they are by general and universal science, so that they might form a whole for the benefit of each; but, above all, he insisted upon the necessity of making religion a leading feature throughout, designating it as a chief and unerring support in the prosecution of any other profession.

We are gratified to learn, that the classes in the medical, as indeed in the other departments of the college, are daily increasing; and in the school alone, we have been assured that there has been an addition of upwards of fifty pupils of Jupiter, it pries into the mysteries of its sciences; without which, indeed, he argued, belts. The whole system of primaries and secondaries are, according to their positions, seen in succession, as crescent, half oval, or full orbed; from being all at first inferior having been entirely monopolised by the eccle-

A similar class-room is open to the law-students, containing, we were informed, some valuable law-books given by Lord Henley. There is also a very excellent museum of anatomy, &c. attached to the college, which we have visited, and which, together with the library, we are gratified to learn has been enriched with several valuable donations of books and specimens.

We are pleased to find that the river-front of the college, which will complete the façade of Somerset House, and render it a uniform building, is in a state of progress; and as we perceive, by the last advertisement, that the new subscriptions towards carrying this great national object into effect already amount to nearly six thousand pounds, we cannot but express our hope that the friends and wellwishers to the institution, as well as those whose good taste may have been offended by the want of uniformity hitherto existing at the eastern end of Somerset House, will supply the necessary funds for completing, at the same time, two of the finest buildings in the metropolis.

An introductory lecture to the study of botany was also delivered, on Wednesday, by Professor Gilbert Burnett; in the course of which he made some very interesting remarks on the properties of plants, fungi, &c., and their uses—whether for domestic, chemical, or medicinal purposes; classing them in their order and genus, and illustrating his observations by the numerous specimens with which he was surrounded. His remarks and quotations respecting the sea-weed, the despised alga of the ancients, so much esteemed in our own times for its valuable properties, were peculiarly apposite and edifying; and a graduated sale which he exhibited of a chain of nature, from the elements to man upwards, was very curious.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Mustrations of the Surrey Zoological Gardens. Drawn from Nature on stone, with descriptive Notices by W. H. Kearney. Part III. Schloss.

THIS part contains the wild ass, ruffed lemur, and the leopard. The same correctness, both in the drawing and in the execution of the animals, is displayed as in the preceding parts; and the action is in perfect accordance with the nature of the subject.

Piews of the Old and New London Bridger Drawn and etched by E. W. Cooke. Part II. Brown.

THE favourable opinion of this publication which we expressed in our notice of the first Part, has been confirmed, and more than con-firmed, by its successor. The "Steps of New London Bridge, St. Magnus, the Monument, and part of the old bridge; 'the 'Demolition of the Great or Chapel Pier of old London

Sketches in Italy. Drawn on stone by W. Linton. No. XII. London: Moon, Boys, and Graves; Colnaghi, Son, and Co.; and Rodwell.

IT must be matter of gratulation to all who are interested in the improvement of the fine arts, and the encouragement of native talent, when undertakings of "pith and moment" are brought to a successful issue; and such we consider to be most decidedly the case in the present publication. Our comments have kept pace with the numbers as they appeared: in all we have found matter for commendation; and whether viewed severally or collectively, we are warranted in saying that the artist has well redeemed his pledge, which, it will be remembered, was to give fac-similes of sketches. All who have seen them must acknowledge the fidelity of their representation. We mention this, as it often happens that some are apt to make undue comparisons, or to expect in sketches a finished performance; but whatever opinions may be formed on this point respecting the work before us, we feel ourselves bound to assert, that, in every efficient quality, these drawings convey to the mind of the artist and the amateur the perfect character of the scenes thus represented, and the effects under which they were taken. In many of them the execution and effect are so complete, that, seen at a proper distance, nothing appears wanting either in tone or finish; and from the abundant store of objects which this classic land affords, a selection has been made, both of novelty and of interest, differing in most, if not in all respects from the views furnished by other artists or tourists. Nor has it been a hasty march or a transient glance that has enabled Mr. Linton to accomplish this object; but he has evidently devoted a sufficient time of residence on or near the spot to acquaint himself with its localities, and their adaptation to the pencil and the pen.

This number contains, Lake of Albano and Castle of Gandolfo; Cormayeur; Frascati; the Temples of Vesta and Fortuna Virilis, Rome; Grotta Ferrata; the Forum; Rome from the Pincian Hill; Monte Competri or Compatro. These, with two vignettes - view from the Col de Seigne and Ferrara the ducal palace -together with a map of Italy, and the route taken by the artist, conclude the work.

As examples of a tasteful choice, and that full and complete effect which, as we have observed, belong to many of these views, we would quote in the present number Grotta Ferrata; the Forum; Rome from the Pincian Hill; and Monte Competro. In recommending this superb work to the encouragement it so deservedly merits, it would be unjust to omit mentioning the beauty and elegance of its typographical character, and the handsome way in which the whole is got up.

Of the memoirs, it is probable that that of the Scottish duke will be considered the most interesting, in consequence of there not having hitherto been any biographical notice of that distinguished nobleman, so celebrated for his attachment to old English literature and typography. The following anecdote is strik-ingly illustrative of his loyalty and disinterestedness :-

"His majesty (George III.) had, in early life, promised to bestow upon him the office of keeper of the great seal of Scotland, which happened to fall vacant at the time that Mr. Dundas afterwards Lord Melville) directed the system of government as applied to the northern por-tion of the empire. The secretary accordingly went to the king, and requested the appointment for the Duke of Gordon; when his majesty, remembering his promise, informed Mr. Dundas of it, and expressed his determination to give it to Roxburghe. But it is not always, perhaps not often, in our limited monarchy, that the king can have his own way; and Mr. Dundas respectfully represented, that it was necessary for the support of the ministry to select the Duke of Gordon; and, besides, that the Duke of Roxburghe was now rich, and not in want of the post. Still his majesty, faithful to his word, resisted the proposed substitution; and at length only consented to the secretary's waiting upon his nominee, and explaining the circumstances to him. The result was, that his grace expressed his warmest gratitude to his royal friend, and his cordial happiness that, in relieving him from his pledge, he was able to render a service to his majesty's government. The king was loud in stating the sense he entertained of this disinterested sacrifice, and of the obligation he felt in consequence; nor could his esteem be lessened in future years, when he could say of his noble and faithful servant, that 'he was always glad to see him, for he never asked a favour !'

It is mentioned in Chambers' memoir of Sir Walter Scott, alluded to in a subsequent page of our Gazette, that the ballad of the "Eve of St. John" procured him "many marks of attention and kindness from Duke John of Roxburghe, who gave him the unlimited use of that celebrated collection of volumes from which the Roxburghe Club derives its name."

THE importer of this publication has taken some pains to inform us that the study of the human head, beginning, of course, with the individual features, is better calculated to give the amateur a knowledge of the principles of drawing, than the study of landscape; a fact which we never doubted, and which has been invariably insisted upon in all our respectable academies, and by every competent writer on the subject. Nor are we without excellent examples for the novice; for instance, the drawing-book designed by Cipriani, and engraved by Bartolozzi. We prefer the earlier numbers of the work under our notice to the later. M. Lemire's countenances are purely French; not the slightest attempt being made to unnationalhair ought to be represented, study the simple | &c. &c. but tasteful masses into which it is thrown by Illustrations of Heath's Picturesque Annual. 1833. Longman and Co.

WE have said in years bygone, that no efforts in this style of art could ever surpass those immediately before us; but on looking over this series of gems, we are inclined to retract, and to say that nothing before has been so excellent. Of the twenty-four proof prints before us, we know not which are the most beautiful. From the exquisite vignette of the Net-maker, to the last of the collection, the variety of subject, the truth and brilliancy of the views, and the mingled force and grace of execution, are so striking, that nothing but actual inspection can convey any idea of the perfection exhibited. The pencil of Stanfield never possessed more of interest and grace; and ample justice has been done to his delightful drawings by the able artists who have transferred them to the steel. We cannot now go into a nomination of the subjects; but we will state, that all of them are highly picturesque; and some of them most lovely. As a whole they are a treasure in art.

Illustrations of the Keepsake. 1833. R. Jennings.

ANOTHER performance of extraordinary beauty. A classic wreath and a fine medallion of the King, lead the way to fifteen pieces of very diversified character — female beauty, pathetic interest, landscape, humorous story, domestic scenes, poetical images, historical memories, &c. &c. as the literary portion of the volume has required. Not yet possessing that portion, we can only speak generally of its illustrations, which are of the foremost order in productions of this kind, and enough to recommend the volume to which they belong to as extensive a popularity as any Annual has yet attained. Perhaps the Picturesque Annual is superior in art as in the numbers of its attractions; but to the many, who love the variety of incident in engravings, the Keepsake will be as acceptable as both publications must be to the amateur.

Tombleson's Views of the Rhine: with Letterpress Descriptions in the English, French, or German Language. Edited by William Gray Fearnside, Esq. Virtue.

Gray Fearnside, Esq. Virtue.
This publication, from No. 1 to No. 8 (the last number under our notice), presents many well-chosen and interesting views, executed in a style that, considering the price at which the work is sold, is quite astounding. The descriptions contain a great deal of information that must prove highly valuable to the traveller.

The Byron Gallery. Part III. Smith, Elder, and Co.

This is, in our opinion, decidedly the best number of the Byron Gallery that has hitherto appeared. There is great beauty in the illustration of "Manfred," by Howard; of "the Dream," by Corbould; and of "Parisina," by Wood; and the illustration of the " Hours of Idleness," by Richter, is full of charming simplicity and taste.

BIOGRAPHY.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

As usual, the periodical press in every corner of the country overflows with the leading seen, it is but justice to acknowledge that nothing like the Supplement to Chambers' Edinburgh Journal, obligingly sent to us, has satisfactory history of the lamented dead. Mr. literary and antiquarian pursuits (which Sir Walter warmly befriended), was possessed of ample and authentic materials for his purpose; letter-press which would make a tolerablesized octavo volume. It sets out with the parentage of the deceased, and proceeds, without affectation or bombast, to present a clear, manly, and impartial account of his early scenes, his education, his professional steps, his political bias, his first literary efforts, his many publications, his private life and national honours, his editorial labours, his pecuniary misfortunes, his consequent exertions, his visit to the continent, his last illness, his death and funeral, his personal appearance, and his personal and intellectual character. To produce so interesting a narrative within so short a space is, we repeat, highly creditable to our contemporary; and we take pleasure in lending our aid to make his merit known. And as his sheet is within the reach of all classes. and will no doubt be universally read, we shall only mention from it, that Abbotsford is entailed upon Major Scott, his eldest son, who married Miss Jobson with a consider able fortune; that 22,000%. falls to his creditors from life insurances; and that previous dividends paid upon his debts, amounted to 11s. 8d. in the pound, so productive had been his works since 1825. Thus 54,000l. had been paid off; the insurances will add 22,000l. more, making a total of 76,000l. in seven years. The original engagements, it is said, amounted to 102,000%, upon which there must be a large sum of interest; but altogether this statement affords a fair hope that by honourable arrangement, and a well-warranted appeal to public feeling, the debt of gratitude we all owe to the author who has delighted our hearts and adorned our age, may be nobly discharged, and his name and race be established in a manner befitting them and the country.

DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

MONDAY, October 1st, was, besides pheasantgrand new spectacle; the opening of the Adelphi they had witnessed the performance, where with a new piece, and two new imports; the opening of the Olympic, and a new burletta; rage of Colberg's interview with a new piece and two new imports; the they depreciated so splendid an effort. The and the Strand Theatre giving Contain St. and the Strand Theatre giving Captain Steassigned.

Among these claims to critical attention, the precedence is due to the tragedy. It is called the House of Colberg, and the author is Mr. Serle, a performer of considerable talent, as well as a dramatic writer, whose Merchant of London was played with success last season, topic of the day, the death of Sir Walter Scott, and we believe published, so that an opportunity memoirs of his life, the state of his affairs, poetical tributes to his genius, his funeral, propositions for monuments, subscriptions, &c.

* In the midst of his rapture in hearing that she lives she approaches with a vacant smile; and all his hopes a once destroyed, he fixes a despairing look upon her and exclaims, "O God! 'tis madness." We never heard four propositions for monuments, subscriptions, &c.

Among all those which we have however, we can only speak of the stage im-but justice to acknowledge that pression upon us in both instances. Thus judging, the House of Colberg, though ably written after the manner of our elder dramacome under our notice. It is indeed highly tists, did not appear to us to contain such creditable to the talents and exertion of the striking passages as we remember in the former editor; and for threepence gives us a most production: in short, nothing was left upon our mind at the close, except what was owing, Chambers, from his locality and acquaintance in a few instances, to the power (we had almost with Sir Walter, as well as from his own said the terrible power) of Macready. The construction of the tragedy is very simple, and there is decidedly far too little of variety in ample and authentic materials for his rurpose; the passions delineated, and in the action, to and he has used them well. This sheet of support a five-act play with interest to the twelve pages, three columns in each, contains end. Colberg (Macready), a reigning prince, of decayed fortune and proud spirit, desires to marry his daughter Agnes (Miss Phillips) to the son (Mr. Cooper) of his old friend and companion in arms, the sovereign Prince of Eisbach, in order to restore his rank and consequence; in every way a suitable match. as the young prince has met the lady at court, and become enamoured of her. But she, meanwhile, has formed a reciprocal and fervent attachment with Frederick Rosen (Mr. Stanley), the captain of her father's archers, and the son of one of his serfs, who, in some battle, had saved his life at the expense of his own. Colberg opens his views to his daughter; she declares her passion for Rosen, but to avert his ruin, consents to sacrifice her love on the altar of filial affection. A scene ensues, in which she communicates their fate to Rosen, who also nobly resolves to sacrifice his hopes.
The Prince of Eisbach arrives, and becomes master of these secrets: and he, too, magnanimously yields his own happiness to make the lovers happy. He repurchases Colberg's estates, and bestows them in dower upon his daughter, whom he privately unites to his rival. So far. all is generous and promising; but then comes the storm. The haughty soul of Colberg spurns this degrading arrangement; and in his fury he slays Rosen, whose bride goes mad, and dies in the arms of her doting and despairing father. It will be seen that there is little room for interest in this meagre plot. The sameness of self-sacrifice after self-sacrifice is not sufficiently diversified by the different positions of the parties, - after all, it is but one passion. or rather a single quality, which is portrayed. The play, therefore, though deserving of praise, and the attempt of encouragement, can never be popular: it has not stamina for a favourite. and indeed the applause which it received on its first representation was chiefly extorted by the masterly acting in Colberg.

We have been more than surprised to read the remarks of some of our contemporaries upon this admirable personation, in which such just conception and beauty of execurage of Colberg's interview with Eisbach when his daughter's marriage is told—his comvens and the Loves of the Devils - both novel punctions feelings, expressed by the counteties, if not (for we are not sure in the midst of nance far beyond the language of the poet these distractions) belonging to the precise date after the murder of Rosen, especially where he rises from his chair, sits again, and at lasrushes from the chamber - his utter horror or discovering his daughter's insanity and his final grief in uttering the words, "Poor dead thing!" were never surpassed upon the stage. As we do not suppose the House of Colberg.

COVENT GARDEN.

Mr. Planché, whose unfailing tact is as conspicuous upon such occasions as are his talents when productions of a higher order are brought forward. Of the débutant we would say little: he is young, and, we are told, possesses many requisites for a prominent pursuit of his profession; but he was very unfortunate in his his charge; and the whole appointments of the stage are as magnificent as they are correct. But of these things anon. The story rect. But of these things anon. of the spectacle is simply a portion of a cam-paign under Marshal Turenne, in which the Duke of Monmouth commanded the English allies of the French against the Dutch, and Captain John Churchill, afterwards the famous by his brave exploits. In performing one of these, he departs from orders, attacks and destroys a convoy which Turenne had secretly permitted to pass as a manœuvre to mislead of the marshal's campaign. He is consequently arrested in the midst of his victorious exultation, and is about to be brought to trial; when Englishman," he points out some measures of such masterly tactics, that a reconciliation takes Place, and the war proceeds on his suggestions. As part of this, he heads a forlorn hope in an assault on Nimeguen; the triumph of which ends the drama. This triumph, and his escape cost of the lives of his comrade in arms, the de Marsin, who is passionately attached to Churchill, and devotes herself, in disguise, to Spring a mine, which destroys her, but saves former excellence in the part; and Abbot's educated, but vain, gossipping, and heartless;

There he would redeem the campaign. This was admirably done; but only superior to the rest as it afforded a higher opportunity. Mr. Forbeen playing upon it, instead of engaged in rester, in Churchill, was very respectable, in the true sense of the word, not as a diminutive of approbation, as it is often accounted in dramatic criticism. His face is too hand-THE management made a stumble on the some for strong expression; and our readers threshold by trying a new Shylock; which will please to remark, that regular and good was, however, redeemed by the success of features are not so well suited to depict the His First Campaign, a piece most skilfully struggles of great emotions, as less favoured stapted to the circumstances of the theatre by and more marked visages. In the one case, that which pleases becomes distorted; in the other, that which has produced no perceptible impression becomes animated with new soul, and can display the varieties of passion with force, and without deformity. Mr. For-rester's line is, as a sequitur, light comedy. The other characters were all sustained with first attempt, and requiescat in pace must be a veri-similitude very rare where so many are it epitaph. With regard to the military specing ewhich followed with so much éclat: as tor, Bartley's Major Marsin, Mitchell's Mrs. critics have been prone to identify Lord Byron Branagan (an Irish sutler), and Turnour's with his writings, so is it hardly possible to Jan Peer (the Dutch spy), were all, what they aroid connecting the individual, Laporte, as ought to be, in excellent hands; and the pernew lessee and manager, with this production, so full of spirit, and enterprise, and splen-added surprisingly to the scenic illusion. This don. The house itself is fitted up with a minute attention to costume deserves to be brilliancy which promises that neither expense especially applauded—it is a great merit; and nor exertion are likely to be wanting under when we say that the scenery (by Grieve) was equally accurate and superb, we have only paid a just tribute to the liberality and talent displayed in both instances. The battered mill, and siege and storming of Nimeguen, were almost real: several hundred combatants mounted the breach, in the midst of most warlike operations. The music is pretty enough in the songs and glees, and characteristic (though rather noisy) in other parts. Altogether, as repetition on Wednesday proved, Mr. Laporte will find this, His First Campaign, so attractive, that he may well wish it to be an omen of his first campaign throughout at Covent his enemy; and thus frustrates the whole plan Garden. We had nearly forgot a ball scene, most superb, and some good French dancing by Guerinot, Adele, and others.

On Wednesday, the play was the Hunchback, with Miss Ellen Tree as the heroine, and the in an interview with Turenne, who is still the with Miss Ellen Tree as the heroine, and the ardent friend and admirer of "his handsome rest of the cast as before. Comparisons, they say, are odious, though it is difficult to criticise this part without reference to prior occupants; yet we shall only observe, that Miss Tree gave us no cause of regret throughout her entire personation of this arduous character. Several ends the drama. This triumph, and his escape of the very striking points she did not mark from destruction, however, is achieved at the out so highly as Miss Kemble; yet she was very impressive in all, and in various places French Lieut. Victor, and of his cousin Estelle supplied new graces and new lights. Altoge-

Modus, (one of those secondary parts which it is most difficult to enact well,) shewed how advantageous it is to the drama to have able performers who will do other characters below Richards, Macbeths, Hamlets, and Romeos. Mr. Knowles made no difference in Master Walter; so we might conclude, like a custom. house return, the Hunchback as per last.

ADELPHI.

A HAUNT of continued amusement and laugh. ter, the Adelphi has commenced as it left off, with popular productions, acted in a very superior manner. Rip van Winkle, founded on Washington Irving's well-known tale, with a prodigious increment of other matter relating to Henrick Hudson's spectre ship and American electioneering-is a drama more recommended by the style in which it is performed than by its incidents. Rip (Yates), escaping from a shrew, his wife (Mrs. Daly), instead of falling asleep after bowls with the mountain spirits, is carried off by Hudson (O. Smith) for twenty years, as his helmsman; leaving his daughter, a child, betrothed to the son (Hemmings) of Peter Schuyp (W. Bennet), if not cancelled within twenty years. Young Schuyp turns out a roué, and Rip is freed from his supernatural fetters only in time to annul the contract, liberate his daughter from a hateful union, see her claimant borne off to succeed him at the helm, and die. The intermediate space and business of the stage are filled by J. Reeve, as a brigadier and storekeeper, candidate for a seat in Congress, and his opponent Buckstone, with their adherents, in the contested election. The principal feature in the piece is the acting of Rip van Winkle, — his pusillanimous submission to his termagant in the first act, and his extraordinary change to age and decrepitude in the last. Both are replete with dramatic talent. The scenery is also very good; and the phantom vessel and its spectral crew quite in the popular style of the Adelphi. Of Cupid we need only repeat, that the audience laughed at it from beginning to end, as they did at the Olympic, and that Reeve is as great a god as ever; nor could he be less with such a mother as Miss Daly, and such a Slykey as Mrs. Honey. former of these actresses has been rapidly and progressively improving; and with a fine person and appearance, fills the multifarious business assigned to her with uncommon talent and great promise. In the Pet of the Petticoats
Mrs. Fitzwilliam displays first - rate comic powers; and is capitally supported by Buckstone as the Dancing-Master, W. Bennett, as the Gardener of the Convent, and by as pretty a train of parlour boarders as we have often seen assembled on any stage. The piece goes off with prodigious éclat, and well merits all the applause bestowed upon it.

OLYMPIC.

THE novelty produced at this theatre is a burletta, by Mr. Charles Dance, and entitled the Water Party. It does great credit to the talents of the writer, and is delightfully performed, especially by Mrs. Orger, who made her curtsy on the occasion in the part of Mrs. Butts, an illiterate but kind-hearted citizen's wife. The Water Party is not only agreeable from its adherence to actual life, and the naïveté of the dialogue, but possesses a merit, altogether unusual in the class of drama to which it belongs, in the clever delineation of character, and the contrast which it affords. The two Deputy's ladies and the other, Mrs. Butts, raised from low degree, but overflowing with the milk of human kindness. The ladies have two daughters, Miss Pincott and Mrs. Bland, and these two fathers, as already stated, Mr. W. Vining and Mr. Wyman, and also two lovers; and the whole proceed in a boat upon a water party up the Thames, in company with a capital fellow, viz. Mr. Liston, as Anthony Charles Fluid, a retired hair-dresser. As usual, there is a pelting rain, and other misadventures, in the midst of which the love-affairs of the burletta go on; and at last the sweethearts are made happy, and the curtain descends before a well-pleased andience.

STRAND THEATRE.

Captain Stevens is a smart little piece, well suited to variegate the evenings' entertainments at this snuggery; and the Loves of the Devils (by Mr. Rede), a very clever, radical sort of burlesque, hitting right and left at all topics of the times. The angel (from the Loves of the Angels) descends to the lower regions, à la Juan, and makes those quarters too hot to hold him, and the Olympic deities who have also gone below. They are restored to earth, and in human affairs produce a comical and often witty confusion. A Mr. Manders, as a stout Cupid, is a coarse, but laughable, caricature of Reeve; and, bating in the whole a vein of vulgarity, the talents of Mr. Rede deserve a public compliment.

VARIETIES.

Ants.-On the last day of July the workmen in the port of Brest were driven from their dinner, and obliged to fly from the assault of an innumerable host of winged large black and small red ants.

Law of Libel in Sweden .- In Sweden, where the press is not permitted to take cognisance of every thing, public or private, as in our betterinformed community, the chancellor has commenced a prosecution against Count Aldersparre. to try whether he is legally entitled to publish letters written by Count Wetterstedt and Lagerbjelke without their consent, in his seventh part of a Swedish historical work.

The Scrap-Book .- In our review of the Drawing-Room Scrap-Book, we neglected to notice some very clever initial letters, cut in wood, and which give a very fanciful appearance to the pages where they are employed. The frontispiece has a portrait of the young Queen of Portugal, Donna Maria.

Mr. Pemberton delivered the last of a course of lectures illustrative of oratory, at the theatre of the Western Institution, on Thursday evening. A similar course he concluded last week at the City of London Institution. The efficient orator must drink at that fountain which springs within himself-from which all art flows -feeling. It is the simplicity of unrestrained. unembarrassed conversational manner, from which is produced all that is vigorous, elegant, or impressive, or inflammatory, in an orator's delivery. Mr. Pemberton abounds in figures is too redundant; but many of them are rich, and all are vivid - sometimes highly humorous. He seems to be a reckless squanderer of poetical imagery and rhetorical figures; but he is also excellent at setting things in their proper light, and shewing them clearly. We heard him last spring talking to audiences of tens and fifteens: in his discourses now, he is heard by half as many hundreds, who crowd the theatres of the Institutions on his lectureevenings.

lenstein, who has been settled for a long while at Bath, is about to give the good folks in the north a treat of his Jews' harp. His extraordinary performances on this instrument were originally noticed in the Literary Gasette, and, as well as Mr. E.'s musical compositions, have frequently since been the theme of our trump of praise. We would wager a bodle that he will be better liked by our friends on the other side of the Tweed than the magic flute, the bagpine. or even the national fiddle.

Jacobite MSS. - The Edinburgh Observer states that a very valuable collection of Ja-cobite MSS. has lately fallen into the hands of a literary gentleman of that city, and will shortly be published. Among them is a memoir by a principal agent of the Stuarts, previous to the 45, which, it is said, compromises many names hitherto unsuspected: also a narrative of the expedition in letters from Lord George Murray, and an authentic account of all that was discussed in Prince Charles's councils. Another remarkable document is a particular detail of the prince's adventures and escape; and one equally curious is his household-book, with every expense incurred from his arrival at Holyrood House to the battle of Culloden.

Curious Coincidence .- History is a great plagiarist; it often repeats itself. Events move in a circle, only they come back with a graver face. A fortnight ago (see L. G. p. 597) we quoted from Sarran's History of the late Revolutions in France a passage in which he was particularly eloquent about the enthusiasm of the people during the "three glorious days," and told us that women mingled in the fight, and even children took up arms. We have just found a parallel passage in Cardinal de Retz's Memoirs. The day of the barricades was equally glorious in his time; and, it seems, women and children were just as active during La Fronde. The cardinal, then the great ringleader of popular commotion, states:—
"The movement was like a sudden and violent conflagration, which extended from Pont Neuf to all the city. There were more than two hundred barricades in Paris in less than two hours, hung with flags; every body, without exception, flew to arms. You saw children of five and six years old with the dagger in their hand—the arms, in many instances, given them by their mothers. I saw, among others, a lance dragged rather than carried by a little boy of eight years old."

The Atmosphere of London .- M. Darcet, in his recent visit to England, remarked with surprise the dazzling whiteness of the marble at the stone-masons shops in London, which contrasted strongly with the surrounding objects. On examining the marble, he discovered that it had quite lost its polish and become slightly -an effect which he could only attribute to the presence of sulphurous acid in the atmosphere of that great city. To assure himself of the correctness of this hypothesis, he placed a piece of litmus paper on his hat every morning before going out, and invariably found it reddened: some small pieces of the paper, which were exposed only a few minutes, were marked with a great number of red points. The existence of this acid in the atmosphere of London must be very prejudicial to the health of the inhabitants, and may, in some degree, account for the numerous cases of phthisis. is curious that this fact should not have been noticed by the many physicians who have analysed the air of the metropolis. M. Darcet is occupied in examining the fossil coal of Eng. 1887. The coupled in examining the fossil coal of Eng. noticed by the many physicians who have analysed the air of the metropolis. M. TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A pressure of matter, and the necessary space allotted this week to our dramatic criticism, obliges us to postpone the conclusion of the Review of Byron, Vol. X., and several other articles meant for publication.

The attacks upon the Literary Gazette, alluded to by our correspondent Vindex, are too despicable to merit notice from us. Every person of sense is aware (and who cares for the opinions of fools?) that those who habitually impute dishonourable motives to others, are the most likely to be guilty of base conduct themselves. A dirty little chandler may be perfectly in character when he puffs his own articles and cries down all other shops; but his inferior wares do not a bit the more impose upon the public. In literature, to repeat the lie continually, in the hope that it may obtain some belief where readers may be as ignorant of circumstances as the slanderers are (or wilfully pretend to be) of facts,—is assuredly beneath contempt. The integrity of the Literary Gazette, above price and beyond bias, is well known to every publisher, artist, inventor or discoverer of novelty, in London; and we fearlessly challenge the wide world to produce one instance in which it has, during sixteen years, deceived it by an unjust or false report.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

Records of My Life. By the late John Taylor, Esq. author of "Monsieur Tonson." 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. Bull.

For half a century few men were better known upon town, as the phrase is, and especially in the dramatic circles, than Jack Taylor, as he was called by his familiars. Connected with the periodical press, when its columns were not so crowded as they now are with a noisy throng, among whom it is difficult to distinguish individual forms, he associated intimately with politicians, and players, and artists, and authors, for very many years; and it is of these parties that his reminiscences treat. It is impossible that such a work could be otherwise than so; though it must be confessed, at the same time, that it is loose and unconnected, occasionally inaccurate and mistaken, guilty now and then of repetitions and of venerable anecdotes, and not always agreeing with itself. Still, present and last two generations marshalled before us, their names suggesting to the writer curious stories respecting them, and amusing sayings, either observed by himself or handed down to him by hearsay.

Taylor was a strange character. Lively, facetious, a most inveterate punster, he frequently gave great animation to company, both by saying and provoking good things. A cermarred his effects; and if sometimes carried a little too far, there were other times when few dents, and in a jocularity almost peculiar to himself. We remember on such occasions advising him to commit his inexhaustible fund to writing; but his reply always was, that though his stores of memory were elicited by conversation, he could not give them consistency for narrative and publication. And these records shew that his estimate was well founded, though there is enough, in any way, to constitute one of the most amusing pieces of biographical and anecdotical gossipry that has been produced in our language. Of this we shall now proceed to select illustrations; not thinking it necessary to trouble our readers with the author's family, birth, parentage, and education, farther than that he was the son of a reputable surgeon, descended from the famous Chevalier Taylor, and brought up to the pro-fession of an oculist. We commence, however, with an ancestral tradition.

"I learned (says Mr. T.) from Dr. Monsey, one of my father's earliest and warmest friends, that my great grandfather was an eminent surgeon at Norwich, and highly respected in his private, as well as professional character. He had so grave and dignified an aspect and demeanour, that the superstitious disguiamong his neighbours imputed supernatural tion.

knowledge to him, and upon any disasters and | similar deportment in the mistress of the house, losses consulted him as a conjuror. No mistake of that kind was ever made respecting any other part of our family that I ever heard of. Dr. Monsey related the following story as a my venerable grandsire's reputed powers above the ordinary race of mankind, waited on him, requesting to know whether or not the spoon had been stolen, and, if so, desiring that he would enable him to discover the thief. The old gentleman took him into a garret which contained nothing but an old chest of drawers, telling the simple rustic, that in order to effect that such a work could be otherwise than the discovery, he must raise the devil, asking entertaining, and this publication is eminently him if he had resolution enough to face so formidable and terrific an appearance. The countryman assured him that he had, as his conscience was clear, and he could defy the devil and all his works. The surgeon, after an awful warning, bade him open the first drawer, and tell what he saw. The man did these blemishes occur but on trifling matters, and hardly detract from the general interest with which we see the noted men and women of the reputed seer, 'he is not there.' The old gentleman, again exhorting the man, in the most solemn manner, to summon all his fortitude for the next trial, directed him to open the second drawer. The man did so, with unshaken firmness, and in answer to the same question re-peated, 'Nothing.' The venerable old gentle-man simply said, 'Then he is not there,' but, with increased solemnity, endeavoured to impress the sturdy hind with such awe as to tain spice of malice rather heightened than induce him to forbear from further inquiry, but in vain; conscious integrity fortified his mind, and he determined to abide the event. persons could cope with him in playing the My worthy ancestor then, with an assumed agreeable, relating bon-mots, and droll incihim to prepare for the certain appearance of the evil spirit on opening the third drawer. The countryman, undismayed, resolutely pulled open the drawer, and being asked what he saw, said, 'I see nothing but an empty purse. 'Well,' said the surgeon, 'and is not that the devil?' The honest countryman bad sense enough to perceive the drift of this ludicrous trial, and immediately proclaimed it over the city of Norwich. The result was, that my venerable and humorous ancestor was never again troubled with an appeal to his divining faculty and magical power, but was still more respected for the good sense and whimsical manner in which he had annihilated his supernatural character, and descended into a mere mortal."

Our next selection is related of a Mr. Donaldson, a literary man with whom the writer was intimate in his younger days.

"In order to attend the house of commons he had taken apartments in St. Anne's churchyard, Westminster. On the evening when he that appeared to him mysterious in the manner of the maid-servant, who looked like a man who soon after entered his room, and asked him if he wanted any thing before he retired to rest: disliking her manner, he soon dismissed her, and went to bed, but the disagreeable impression proof of my great grandfather's reputation for made on his mind by the maid and mistress, supernatural knowledge and wisdom. A coun- kept him long awake: at length, however, he tryman had lost a silver spoon, and, excited by fell asleep. During his sleep he dreamed that the corpse of a gentleman, who had been murdered, was deposited in the cellar of the house. This dream co-operating with the unfavourable, or rather repulsive countenances and demeanour of the two women, precluded all hopes of renewed sleep; and it being the summer season, he rose about five o'clock in the morning, took his hat, and resolved to quit a house of such alarm and terror. To his surprise, as he was leaving it, he met the mistress in the entry, dressed, as if she had never gone to bed. She seemed to be much agitated, and inquired his reason for wishing to go out so early in the morning. He hesitated a moment with increased alarm, and then told her that he expected a friend, who was to arrive by a stage in Bishopsgate-street, and that he was going to meet him. He was suffered to go out of the house, and when revived by the open air, he felt, as he afterwards declared, as if relieved from impending destruction. He stated, that in a few hours after he returned with a friend, to whom he had told his dream, and the impression made on him by the maid and the mistress: he, however, only laughed at him for his superstitious terrors; but, on entering the house, they found that it was deserted, and calling in a gentleman who was accidentally passing, they all descended to the cellar, and actually found a corpse in the state which the gentleman's dream had represented. Before I make any observations on the subject, I shall introduce a recital of a similar description, and care not if scepticism sneer, or ridicule deride, satisfied that I heard it from one on whose veracity I could most confidently depend. I will, however, now take leave of Mr. Donaldson, though I could with pleasure dwell much longer on the memory of so valuable a friend. The other extraordinary story to which I have alluded, I heard from what I consider unimpeachable authority. Mrs. Brooke, whom I have already mentioned, told me that she was drinking tea one evening in Fleet-street, where a medical gentleman was expected, but did not arrive till late. Apologising for his delay, he said he had attended a lady who suffered under a contracted throat, which occasioned her great difficulty in swallowing. She said that she traced the cause to the following circumstance. When she was a young woman, and in bed with her mother, she dreamed that she was on the roof of a church struggling with a man who attempted to throw her over. He appeared in a carman's frock, and had red hair. Her motook possession, he was struck with something ther ridiculed her terrors, and bade her compose herself to sleep again; but the impression of her dream was so strong, that she could not disguised; and he felt a very unpleasant emo-tion. This feeling was strengthened by a she had appointed to meet her lover at a bowl-

She had passed over one field in hopes of meeting the gentleman, and sung as she tripped along, when she entered the second field, and accidentally turning her head, she beheld, in the corner of the field, just such a man as her dream represented, dressed in a carman's frock, with red hair, and apparently approaching towards her. Her agitation was so great, that she ran with all her speed to the stile of the third field, and with difficulty got over it. Fatigued, however, with running, she sat on the stile to recover herself, and reflecting that the man might be harmless, she was afraid that her flight, on seeing him, might put evil and vindictive thoughts into his head. While in this meditation, the man had reached the stile, and seizing her by the neck, he dragged her over the stile, and she remembered no more. It appeared that he had pulled off all her clothes, and thrown her into an adjoining ditch. Fortunately, a gentleman came to the spot, and observing a body above the water, he hailed others who were approaching, and it was immediately raised. It was evidently not dead, and some of the party remarking that the robber could not be far off, went in pursuit of him, leaving others to guard and endeavour to revive the body. The pursuers went different ways, and some, at no great distance, saw a man at a public-house sitting with a bundle before him. He seemed to be so much alarmed at the sight of the gentlemen, that they suspected him to be the culprit, and determined to examine the bundle, in which they found the dress of the lady, which some of them recognised. The man was, of course, immediately taken into custody, and was to be brought to trial at the approaching assizes. The lady, however, was too ill to come into court, but appearances were so strong against him, that he was kept in close custody, and when she was able to give evidence, though he appeared at the trial with a different dress and with a wig on, she was struck with terror at the sight of him, and fainted, but gave evidence; the culprit was convicted and executed. The medical gentleman added, that when she had finished her narrative, she declared that she felt the pressure of the man's hand on her neck, while she related it, and that her throat had gradually contracted from the time when the melancholy event occurred. At length her throat became so contracted, that she was hardly able to receive the least sustenance."

Ghost stories are always interesting, but they are rather too long for exhibiting the features of a work like this; and so we go to shorter matters.

London, he had been very intimate with Sir Robert Walpole. Sir Robert was fond of wit and humour, and sometimes gave a dinner to his friends at an inn in the neighbourhood of his own seat, Houghton Hall. The landlord of this inn was reputed to be a great wit; and Sir Robert admired his prompt humour so much, that he generally desired him after dinner to join the company and take his place at the social board. The company were generally gratified by the humour of the landlord, who by the encouragement of Sir Robert was admitted upon terms of equality. On one of these occasions, when Monsey was of the party, an old dull Norfolk baronet, who had nothing to recommend him but wealth, was so jealous of the attention which the landlord received, that he openly remonstrated with Sir all the gentlemen present, condescended to admit him, he saw no reason why the baronet should take exceptions. ' Pho!' said the baronet, 'your father was a butcher.' 'Well,' said the landlord, 'there is no great difference between your father and mine; for if my father killed calves, yours brought them up.' All the company took the joke immediately, except the baronet, who replied, 'What! do you make my father a grazier?'"

This Monsey seems to have anticipated the posthumous patriotism of our age on the subject of anatomy.

"He had the utmost contempt for funeral ceremonies, and exacted a promise from his daughter that she would not interfere with the arrangement which he had made with Mr. Thompson Forster, the surgeon, for the disposal of his body, conceiving that whenever it was dissected by that gentleman, something might occur for the illustration and advance-ment of anatomy. 'What can it signify to me,' said he, ' whether my carcass is cut up by the knife of a surgeon, or the tooth of a worm? He had a large box in his chambers at Chelsea, trance when supposed to be dead. It was proaccustomed to say that he should die, as his father did, without any real or nominal complaint, and go out like the snuff of a candle; generally adding, 'I wish I were dead; but, like all fools and all wits, I am afraid to die.'

Of Wilkes, we have the following, among other witticisms :- " In a dispute between Sir Watkin Lewes and himself, the former said, 'I'll be your butt no longer.' 'With all my heart,' said Wilkes; 'I never like an empty one.' It was generally rumoured at the time, that Wilkes wrote an answer to a satirical letter to Sir Watkin from Horne Tooke, when Sir Watkin was sheriff. The answer concluded as follows: 'It only remains, sir, for me, in my office of sheriff, to attend you to that fate which you have long deserved, and which the people have impatiently expected."

Speaking of Frank North, the Earl of Guildford, Mr. Taylor mentions that he was the frolicsome hero of Colman's tale, "Please to ring the bell;" but he tells a still more remarkable anecdote of the author of the " Seasons." It runs thus:-

"The most extraordinary fact in the history of this excellent poet I derived from my late friend Mr. George Chalmers, whose industry, research, and learning, are well known. It was Mr. Chalmers's intention to write the "Before Monsey settled as a physician in life of Thomson; but whether to introduce ondon, he had been very intimate with Sir obert Walpole. Sir Robert was fond of wit do not recollect: he told me, however, the following remarkable fact, on which he assured me I might confidently depend. Mr. Chalmers had heard that an old housekeeper of Thomson's was alive, and still resided at Richmond. Having determined to write a life of the celebrated poet of his country, he went to Richmond, thinking it possible he might obtain some account of the domestic habits of the poet, and other anecdotes, which might impart interest and novelty to his narration. He found that the old housekeeper had a good memory, and was of a communicative turn. She informed him, Thomson had been actually married in early life, but that his wife had been taken by him merely for her person, and was so little calculated to be introduced to his great many years; and when he at last, from some compunctious feelings, required her to come and live with him at Richmond, he still kept her in the same secluded state, so that she appeared to be only one of the old domestics of the family. At length his wife, experiencing little of the attention of a husband, though otherwise provided with every thing that could make her easy, if not comfortable, asked his permission to go for a few weeks to visit her own relations in the north. Thomson gave his consent, exacting a promise that she would not reveal her real situation to any of his or her own family. She agreed; but when she had advanced no farther on her journey than to London, she was there taken ill, and in a short time died. The news of her death was immediately conveyed to Thomson, who ordered a decent funeral; and she was buried, as the old housekeeper said, in the churchyard of old Marylebone church. Mr. Chalmers, who was indefatigable in his inquiries, was not satisfied with the old woman's information, but immediately went and examined the church register, where he found the following entry-'Died, Mary Thomson, a stranger'-in confull of air-holes, for the purpose of carrying his firmation of the housekeeper's testimony. My body to Mr. Forster, in case he should be in a late worthy friend Mr. Malone, I doubt not, would not have been satisfied with this simple vided with poles, like a sedan-chair. He was register, but would have pursued the inquiry till he had discovered all the family of Mary Thomson, the time of the marriage, and every thing that could throw a light on this mysterious event, important and interesting only as it relates to a poet who will always be conspicuous in the annals of British literature. Thus we find that the letter from Thomson to his sister, accounting for his not having married, which is inserted in all the biographical reports of Thomson, is fallacious; and that his con-cealment of his early marriage was the result of pride and shame, when he became acquainted with Lady Hertford, Lord Lyttelton, and all the high connexions of his latter days."

A whimsical story of Horne Tooke is our next quotation :-

"I once called on him in Richmond Buildings, with Mr. Merry, the poet, just as the latter was on the eve of being married to Miss Brunton the actress. In the course of conversation Mr. Tooke adverted to this intended marriage, and directing his discourse to me, said, 'I told this gentleman that I was once as near the danger of matrimony as he is at present; but an old friend, to whom I looked with reverence for his wisdom and experience, gave me the following advice: 'You must first, said he, consider the person of the lady, and endeavour to satisfy yourself that if she has excited, she is likely to secure your admiration. You must deeply scrutinise her mind, reflect whether she possesses a rate of intellect that would be likely to render her an intelligent companion: if you are satisfied she does, you are to examine her temper, and if you find it amiable, and not likely to irritate your own on any occasion, you must proceed to obtain all the information you can procure respecting her parents and other relatives; and if you have no reason to object to their being your relations and companions, you must then inquire who and what are her friends, for you must not expect her to sacrifice all her old connexions when she becomes your wife; and if you find them agreeable people, and not likely to be burthensome or intrusive, and are quite satisfied with the prospect, you may then order your wedding clothes, and fix the day for Robert on his permitting such a man to sit in friends, or, indeed, his friends in general, that the marriage. But I was mistaken, and after much and violent dissention between us, I was at last induced to offer him £500 to relinquish all connexion with the paper, which sum he accepted, and it then became entirely my own (2). During his control over the paper, the day after my sonnet addressed to Lord Byron appeared, the editor thought proper to insert a parody on my lines in the Sun newspaper, in which he mentioned Lord Byron in severe terms, and in one passage adverted to Lady Byron. This last letter is dated Oct. 27th, 1815, more than a month after the other, so that it is evident the subject dwelt upon his lordship's mind, though in the postscript he has treated it jocularly. The letter dated Sept. 25th, is interesting, because it shows, that though his lordship was indifferent to any attacks on himself, he was disposed to come resolutely, if not rashly, for-ward in defence of Lady Byron, of whose amiable qualities he could not but be deeply sensible; and it is therefore a lamentable consideration, that a separation should have taken place between persons so eminently qualified to promote the happiness of each other.

Upon this statement we beg to note, as we have indicated, the following corrections:

1. The attorney employed was a gentleman whose ability in business was only equalled by his wit and talent in social life - the late Mr. F. Fladgate, who had himself been an editor of nised them all, and the grave, alas! closed the the journal in question, and not likely to make such a mistake. The simple fact is, that the kindness. paper had much declined before the activity and intelligence of the Courier, and the party in question (the writer of this, Mr. Jerdan,) was invited by Messrs. Heriot and R. G. Clarke, proprietors of eight-tenths, to undertake the direction of it. As some of its failure was imputed by these gentlemen to a tone of, perhaps, too miscellaneous compliment and panegyric, into which Mr. Taylor's extensive acquaintance and good nature led him, the stipulation alluded to was the most deliberate and express in the whole contract," and with-

2. The violence, we must declare, was all on one side, and the larger proprietors sold out, that they might not be compromised in purchased their shares, encumbered as the paper was by a despotic editor, over whom "Dear Sir,-I am sorry that you should none had the least control, was his error, and persisted in on a right of pre-emption he enme only. It is a long time since things of this but the property was acquired with this evil distinctly known, and could afford no ground for just complaint. In the end, Mr. J. took the sum stated for his share; and lost (besides the expense of a chancery suit), two years' labour as editor, in consequence of there not being profits on the Sun to pay that charge, though by his exertions it had more than doubled, nearly trebled, its circulation.

In this transaction, poor Taylor was the slave of a blind, unreasoning passion, artfully fomented by the individual referred to in the note at the bottom of page 643; and who ultimately ruined his victim. And it is but justice to add, that he not only sincerely repented of the course he had been stimulated to pursue, but took many public opportuni-ties (of which there are hundreds of living and highly distinguished witnesses) to express never had but one feeling-that of sorrow for his unfortunate delusion.

3. With respect to Lord Byron, the writer of this never could entertain any personal hostility to that eminent and gifted individual. His sense of duty to the public, and his desire to impart consistency to any publication under his direction, induced him in this case, as in very many others, to reject offered contributions, and to express his own opinions. That Lord Byron was so much offended in the present instance as to intrust Mr. Douglas kinnaird with a challenge, which that gen-tleman ultimately prevailed upon him not to send, is amusingly contrasted by the goodhumour, which we perceive from Mr. Taylor's relation, he displayed when his spleen had time to cool; and at which Mr. Kinnaird often jested with the writer during subsequent years of friendly acquaintance, both in travelling together in France and at home. But it is almost a pity to preserve any recollections of such disagreements, when time has harmo-

"Curious Tradition .- The inhabitants of the neighbourhood of Sicligully believe that a tiger watches over the deserted tomb of a warrior, whose name has been lost amid the stirring events which followed the early Moosulman conquests of Bengal. The lamp has long ceased to burn upon his grave; but some unseen hand preserves the interior of the mausoleum from the dirt and litter which usually accumulate in ruined buildings. The tomb itself, standing boldly on the summit of a hill in the vicinity of Rajmahal, forms a very interesting and picturesque feature in the landscape. A similar superstition prevails at Secundermallee, in the Carnatic. The mountain is held sacred by all castes, it being supposed to contain the tomb of Alexander the Great, whose temple, on the summit, is said to be regularly swept by royal tigers with their tails."

We add two or three notes.

" Amongst the objects of curiosity shewn to the stranger at Agra, are the fragments of a marble throne which belonged to the Mogul emperors. When the weakness and degeneracy displayed by the successors of Aurungzebe invited foreign aggressions, the Jauts, a warlike people, obtained possession of a considerable territory, together with the city of Agra, the favourite residence of Acbar, Jehanghire, and of Shah Jehan: they stripped the palace of its silver ceilings, and tore down the silver doors from the Taaje Mahal. The leader of the invalers demanded to be brought to the marble musnud of the Moosulman conquerors, which no one else had ever ascended. It is said, that on approaching with an intent to seat himself upon it, the marble broke in two pieces; and the Moosulman inhabitants of Agra are fond of descanting upon the miracle which saved the throne of Acbar from profanation."

"Chak savak, Brahmanee duck. The Hindoes imagine that, for some transgression committed in the human body, the souls of the offending persons are condemned to animate these birds, who are compelled to part at sunset; the male and female flying on different sides of the river, each imagining that the other has voluntarily forsaken the nest, and inviting the supposed wanderer's return with lamentable cries. The brahmins, compassionating the melancholy condition of these birds, hold them sacred, and will not allow them to be molested within the precincts of their jurisdiction."

"Indian Graves .- There cannot be a stronger contrast than that between the burial-places of the Christian and the Moosulman in India. A few of the former stand alone in picturesque spots, but they are generally crowded together in small enclosures of consecrated ground, not usually kept with the neatness and order which is so soothing to the spirits of the living. Few Europeans can view without horror the crowded but neglected cemetery in which they may expect to find a grave. Choked up with weeds, the resort of carrion birds and loathsome beasts. and rarely visited, except upon those melan-choly occasions in which another exile is deposited in his final resting-place, they present the most dismal memento mori imaginable. Moosulman tombs, on the contrary, afford one of the most pleasing spectacles which India produces. They are generally built in some well-frequented place, nor do the living object to make them their habitation. 'Dwellers amid the tombs' are to be found to this day in India, recalling to the memory many passages in the Scriptures. When not sufficiently commodious to afford a shelter, they are still favourite spots for the bivouse of travellers. Innumerable pictures might be made from the three objects so continually combined together in every part of India —a tree, a tomb, and a well. The first and -a tree, a tomb, and a well. last may form the attraction; but they are seldom without a living group, who, at least on one day in the week, light a lamp upon the monumental stone, and strew it with flowers. An officer of rank found the crumbling remnants of an old tomb in the close vicinity of a house he had lately purchased: it was an unsightly object; but knowing that, if he removed it, such an act of desecration would bring him into bad odour with his servants, he restored it to its pristine state. The native attendants were delighted by the mark of respect paid to the deceased, and instantly performed 'their part by furnishing the tomb with a lamp."

We cordially wish the present volume success. Those who are strangers to the gorgeous scenes it depicts will find many a new and beautiful image; while to those familiar with Indian scenery, it will have that most powerful charm_memory.

The Keepsake for 1833. Edited by F. Mansel Reynolds. London, Longman and Co.; Paris, Rittner and Goupill; Frankfort, Charles

THE first Annual in the field this year, the Keensake is well entitled to the priority. As usual, it opens with one of the prettiest faces that ever looked from a frontispiece; it is called "The Adieu," such as Shenstone imagined when he said,

"So sweetly she bade me adieu,
I thought that she bade me return."

The prose tales are various and interesting. Mrs. Charles Gore and Mrs. Shelley have been very happy in their contributions; and "The Novice, or the Convent Demon," is one of Leitch Ritchie's best performances—we regret it is too long for extract. "The Moors," breathing of the heather, is a very fresh and graphic poem, by the Hon. Henry Liddell; and "Pepita, a Mexican story," is an excellent bandit sketch. Lord Dover's is a graceful but also an often-told tale; the history, or perhaps we should say the tradition, of the unfortunate wife of Alexis is generally known—we have seen it in at least half-a-dozen magazines. We shall endeavour to abridge Lord Morpeth's "Tale of Modern Science." The heroine has been attached contrary to her father's will, and has had a parting interview with him, after which he is heard of no more.

Mary Warwick "was sitting with her father in the same way upon the next evening, when an attorney and constable from the large county town about fourteen miles off were shewn into the apartment. It would at no time have been according to the tenor of Mr. Warwick's disposition to receive a domiciliary visit of authority with any great mark of deference; and he now requested, with some appearance of discomposure, to be made acquainted with the motives of this intrusion. 'We are come, sir,' said the attorney, 'to request you will accompany us to —, where two men, whom we understand to have been in your employment, of the name of Boyland, are under arrest upon a most serious charge.' 'They have murdered Walter Carroll!' exclaimed Mary, and fell back upon her chair. 'How comes the young lady to have so clear an insight into the nature of their offence?' put in the attorney. Mr. Warwick replied, 'You are not called upon, sir, to take any notice of what falls from my daughter; private occurrences have taken place of late in my family which have much shaken father,' said Mary, rising recovered and col-lected, 'I am ready to do what must be done, and to say what must be said: I will go with you, sir.' 'My dear child, you could be of no possible use; I really cannot allow it.' On the contrary, sir,' here again interposed the attorney, 'Miss Warwick seems to know more of the matter than any one else; and I feel myself bound to convey her with us. I am sure, sir, you must yourself feel too keenly for the interests of justice to interpose any obstacle. We are most anxious to gain all the possible information that can be gathered upon the subject without loss of time, as the judges are now in the town, and such is the state of public excitement and alarm, that it becomes most trial during the present assizes.' Nothing farther was to be said. Mr. Warwick and his daughter accompanied the attorney to the county town, and their depositions were taken before the magistrates, who were still prosecuting their inquiries at that late hour of the night. Before they broke up, it was finally determined to put the prisoners on their trial immediately. It was at an early hour on Friday morning that the judge, a grave and eloquent functionary, entered the thronged and expecting court. On each side of him the benches were filled with county magistrates, medical practitioners, and even many of that softer sex who often lose their natural repugnance to details of blood and horror in the sense of strong excitement. A woman would in-stinctively shrink more than a man from entering the cell of a maniac or a felon; but place her once within it, and she will explore the working lineaments, and hang on the broken accents, with a far more eager and intense curiosity. Immediately in front of the judge were already placed the two Boylands, strongly fettered, with an expression of countenance in which nervous anxiety seemed to blend and almost lose itself in haggard stupor. In the semicircle beneath sat the gentlemen of the bar, wearing by far the most unconcerned ap-pearance in the whole assemblage, though, perhaps, less so than upon ordinary occasions. In the rear stood the motley group of those who occupied their scanty place by no other privilege than the superior strength or dexterity with which they had floated in at the head of the thick mass which still besieged the door of the court-house, and held angry parlance with the javelin-men who guarded it. Before, however, the few formal preliminaries had been achieved, deep silence reigned within and without: there was that excitement in the case, and that execration of the crime, which awed curiosity into stillness, and suffering into submission. The trial proceeded. Now, a trial, perhaps the most interesting thing of all others in any adequate case to hear, is frequently tedious and unsatisfactory to read, when the necessary length and repetition are unrelieved by the imposing effect of all the exterior circumstance, and by the interest of those nice minutiæ in the behaviour of parties, which are food for ocular observation exclusively. Under this apprehension, I think I should do well to content myself with presenting to my reader a brief summary of the statement delivered by the judge in summing up the evidence, which had spread over several hours of anxious and interesting inquiry. 'Gentlemen of the jury, said he, 'I feel it needless to mention, that the case, upon which you have bestowed so much attention, rests upon what is commonly called circumstantial evidence; no direct proof of the charge has been brought to bear upon the prisoners; it will, of course, be for you to decide whether the combined facts infer that degree of certainty which can alone justify a verdict against them. The first person examined was the porter of the hospital; he identifies the body as brought to him by the two prisoners, exhibited by him to the chief surgeon, and afterwards recognised by numerous persons as the corpse of Walter Carroll. We have here the offence of body-stealing brought home to the prisoners, who are likewise stated by the same witness to have been long addicted to the same practice, and to have frequently supplied the school of anatomy with subjects clandestinely, and, I need not say, illegally obtained: this is not the place or the occasion which could desirable, upon every account, to bring on the tempt me to palliate any breach of the law;

If we were to look to such causes for the origin of this dark deed, far more cogent ground of suspicion would lie against Mr. Warwick himself, for it appears from the evidence of the same old gentlewoman, as well as from the testimony of the father and daughter themselves, that Mr. Warwick having accidentally overheard enough to persuade him that a clandestine, though to all appearance an otherwise honourable attachment, subsisted between his daughter and the deceased, under the irritation—I may say, the natural irritation to which you have listened. Why should I dwell upon the painful preparations for the necessary catastrophe? From the few hours of life allotted to the condemned culprits I turn for a moment, ere I close my melancholy tale, to their desolate and heart-broken victim. After the trying scenes of the court-house, and the powers of self-command there put forth by Mary Warwick, the reaction was too strong for her exhausted frame and withered spirit. Her father had been extremely anxious to take her back to their own home upon the evening of the trial; but neither then, nor during the following Saturday and Sunday, was she in any manner able to leave the lodgings which they occupied in the noisy street opposite the gaol of the assize town. She felt herself better on Monday morning; and after having attempted to swallow a scanty breakfast, she was about to tell her father, whose assiduity and tenderness towards her seemed to increase every instant, that she thought herself equal to the journey, when her attention was attracted by his fixed and earnest gaze through the window of their apartment. She rose and went beside him, when her feelings sustained a deep and harrowing shock at the sight she there encountered: the gate of the prison was open, a vast crowd was gathered in the street, and a kind of procession was moving slowly towards a large wooden structure which appeared in the distance. thoughts which shot through her mind induced her to kneel down, and with closed eyes and clasped hands, to pray for grace to be able to forgive the murderers of her peace and love. When she again raised her head, her father was standing before her with a countenance violently, and even wonderfully, agitated.

'Where is my hat, Mary?' he exclaimed;
'give it me instantly.' 'Here, dear father.

What is it you would be about?' 'Mary, you remember the night when you last saw Walter Carroll?' 'Oh, oh! do not talk of it.' 'Do you remember that we parted in anger?'
'Alas! yes, father.' 'Mary, we met again that night.' 'Father!' 'Mary, those men are not guilty of murder.' When Mary recovered from the deep fainting fit which immedistely followed the utterance of these words. and lifted her head slowly from the floor upon which her whole length lay prostrate, and opened her eyes dimly, and then sent them inquiringly round the room, she perceived that she was alone; then came recollection, and with it a shock that at once shot activity along her limbs and numbness through her soul; but this she soon shook off too, and rushed into the street. The judge had risen that morning from his breakfast, and had ordered round to the door the carriage which was to convey him to the next town upon the circuit, when he was told that a young woman, apparently in great distress of mind, requested to see him upon business the most urgent. 'I do not know,' said his lordship, 'what it can be about; but admit her. Miss Warwick!' for Mary had already forced her way in, and was kneeling at his feet. Pale, haggard, panting, she just gathered breath to articulate, 'The Boylands are innocent! Quick, my lord, quick!' 'Pray rise and explain yourself: why, it was upon your evidence—' 'I know it; I am a guilty wretch! I could not bear you to think my Walter had committed suicide; but he didyou nearly guessed it, my lord-he threw himself into the water. Oh, quick!' Mr. Warwick has just appeared at the foot of the gallows, and acknowledged himself the sole murderer of Walter Carroll! What does it all mean?' Mary answered him faintly, 'It means that I am now alone in this world. Be thou with me, O my God!' She still knelt, and the judge did not bid her rise."

We shall probably return to this volume in our next.

Heath's Picturesque Annual for 1833. Travelling Sketches on the Rhine and in Belgium. With 26 beautifully finished Engravings, from Drawings by Clarkson Stanfield, &c. By Leitch Ritchie, Esq. author of "The Romance of French History." London, 1833. Longman and Co.

THERE is no river that can vie with the Rhine for natural beauty, or for romantic legend. The whole history of chivalry is recorded on its banks, the lovely, the warlike, and the wonderful; every feature of the picturesque feudal times has left its memory there — not a castle but has its tale of other days. Nevertheless, Mr. Ritchie has not produced so interesting a volume as that of last year; much of his narrative is flippent, and his legends are not only twice told, but have most of them been particularly well told before. The traditions of the Rhine have been thing of the more recent, but delightful lyrics of Mr. Planché—have all lent their aid to preserve the records of the Rhine. Our author wants, too, that vivid poetry of imagination which gives its own charm to the tale it tells. Mr. Ritchie is more effective upon actual ground; he manages a murder better than a hands more efficient than superstition.

subjoin some curious robber stories. "We have purposely omitted to the last the band of the Rhine, commanded by the renowned Schinderhannes. All the rest, indeed, may be called bands of the Rhine as well as of Belgium or Holland; but Schinderhannes, except when serving as a volunteer under Picard or other chiefs, never wandered far from the banks of his magnificent river, and may therefore be styled, par excellence, the Robber of the Rhine. This remarkable person was born at Nastætten, of parents in the lowest grade of society, in the year 1779. A public whipping, which he received for some juvenile delinquency, determined his course of life. His young heart was filled with shame and bitterness; and from that moment he sought to ally himself only with those who set at defiance the laws which had degraded him for ever. Having made himself worthy of such fellowship, by committing a daring robbery, and escaping from prison after his apprehension, he sought out Fink, surnamed Red-head, who received him with open arms, and introduced him successively to Mosebach, Seibert, Iltis Jacob, and Zughetto, at that time the most celebrated bandits of the district. The young desperado soon shewed that it was his mission to lead, rather than to follow, and in a very at length the authorities succeeded in apprehending him in the mill of Weiden. While they were conveying him to Oberstein, he contrived to get out upon the roof of a prison where they halted for the night, and attempted to descend by a rope he had manufactured of the straw of his bed. Midway, however, the rope broke, and, reaching the ground with more noise than he contemplated, he was retaken. Secured, at length, in the strong prison of Saarbruck, every body believed that the çareer of the young chief was ended; when, in three days, the country was thrown into consternation by a circular announcing his escape. When Schinderhannes rejoined his comrades, he found them under the command of Petri, surnamed Peter the Black. This worthy was a tall gaunt man, with a forest of black hair, and a thick and matted beard hanging upon his breast. His complexion was sallow, and his voice resembled the croak of a raven, both in sound and augury. When sober, he was plunged in a dull and easy apathy, in which he would do whatever he was bid, to the cutting of a throat, or the burning of a church: when drunk, he was a compound of the wolf and tiger. In the intermediate state, however, when his mind was fully awake without being over-excited, and when he could murder on principle, rather than from passion, or mere stupid instinct, he was the equal of any banditchief unhung. He did not long, however, remain a bar to the young robber's ambition. Being taken, and plunged into a subterranean dungeon, where no brandy was to be had, he conceived such a disgust at the French side of the Rhine, that, on effecting his escape, he the subject of some of our most spirited bal- crossed the river, and did not return for some lads; Sir Walter Scott, Southey - to say no- years. Schinderhannes himself was soon after captured, and lodged in the same dungeon at Simmerm. This was merely a deep vaulted hole, twenty feet under the foundation of a prison-tower on the ramparts, with only a single small opening at the top, through which the captive was let down by means of a rope. The opening of course could not be shut withghost; and terror, real bodily terror, is in his out stifling the prisoner, but, at any rate, there seemed to be no possibility of climbing to it, placed as it was in the middle of the lofty roof; while the chamber into which it led was itself a strong dungeon, tenanted by another malefactor. The young chief, however, was nothing daunted. He twisted a rope of the straw of his bed, threw it to his neighbour above, who made the end fast; and by this means he ascended with ease to the upper chamber. Here he broke through the wall into the kitchen, forced away the defences of one of the windows, and leaped into the ditch of the town, dislocating his foot in the descent. In this state it took him three days and nights to crawl to the house of a friend, lying couched in the forest like a wild beast by day, and resuming his painful journey at night. Having rejoined his band, he soon made it stronger than ever, by the addition of several important members - among others, of Karl Benzel, a young man of family and education, whose romantic character and wild adventures we shall take another opportunity of portraying. At this time he was so well known on the banks of the Rhine that mothers terrified their children with the name of the young and handsome Schinderhannes. In his own immediate neighbourhood, however, he was beloved by the peasantry, who would have died rather than have betrayed him; and one of the his most daring expeditions dressed in boy's clothes. Gay, brave, gallant, generous, and humane, there was a high romance about his character which attracted even those who most abhorred his crimes. He was fond of music, and even poetry; and to this day there is a song sung on the banks of the Rhine which he composed to his mistress. He was addicted to pleasure, and a worshipper of women; but the charms of Julia Blasius, the young girl alluded to above, at length concentrated his wandering desires, and converted him from a general lover into an affectionate and devoted husband. Hitherto, however, he was ignorant of the grandeur and dignity with which the character of the outlaw was invested in Belgium; and when, in homage to his fame, Picard invited him to join an expedition to the banks of the Main, Schinderhannes expected to see only a wandering chief like himself, haunting the deserted mills and ruined castles, roaming on foot from forest to forest, and sweeping the highways when opportunity offered. What. then, was his amazement when received by the renowned bandit at the head of a troop of fifty horse, all regularly armed and accounted, and paid like soldiers, besides their share of the booty! Nor were the Belgians less surprised by the appearance of the band of the far-famed Schinderhannes, which they found to consist of a handful of foot-travellers, each armed and dressed at his fancy, or according to his means, and led on by a stripling, whose handsome person and engaging manners savoured more of the grove than of the camp. This was the first time he had come in contact with the other bands or branches, composing the vast association to which he belonged; and when he returned to his woods, at the end of the campaign, he set himself seriously to the task of introducing order and etiquette into his own system. Unlike the other bandits, he pursued the Jews with special and unrelenting hostility; and became at length so dreaded by the whole Israelitish race settled in the countries of the Rhine, that they petitioned to be allowed to compound with him, by paying a duty resembling the Black Mail of the Scottish highlands. One of these tributaries, Isaac Herz, an extensive merchant of Sobernheim, was notwithstanding so much alarmed for his life, that he did not dare to stir out of doors without an escort of gendarmes; and this coming to the ears of Schinderhannes, the Jew was summoned to appear before him to answer for the misdemeanour. At the instant ap-pointed, the cadaverous face of Isaac was seen at the robber's gate, where a sentry armed at all points stood on guard. Being admitted, he ascended the stair, and found on the landingplace another sentry, who, on learning his business, announced his name. In a few minutes the door opened, and the Jew, cronched almost to the ground, tottered into the room more dead than alive. Schinderhannes, surrounded by his officers standing under arms, was seated, with a telescope before him, by the side of his beautiful Julia, both magnificently dressed. 'It has been reported to us,' said the captain, in a severe tone, 'that thou goest abroad under an escort of gendarmes: why is this?' The Jew gasped, but not a syllable would come. 'Dost thou not know,' continued Schinderhannes more mildly, 'that if I spake but the word, thou wouldest be shot, wert thou in the midst of a whole troop?' Isaac

After all, we doubt whether a volume like the present, rather a work of art than literature, be amenable to very strict criticism. The plates are the great attraction, and they are perfection.

THERE is a great share of talent in these pages, which have also the merit of being laid chiefly among scenes new to a large portion of readers. Many of the characters are drawn with much human life about them; and, in the first tale especially, the interest is well kept up. Whether upon this occasion he had formed a favourable or an inauspicious conjecture, could not be discovered, for he took a seat with the utmost composure. A monotonous accompaniment of humphs and halis not infrequently attends the relation of a case to the most able pleaders. The sergeant always made it a rule to abstain from any such ventriloquisms (as he used to call them), observing, that they had the effect of perplexing the speaker. A slight but significant inclination of the head, a sedate smile, or a symptom of profound attention, would occasionally be visible; but beyond these the sergeant permitted no gesture or interruption to disturb the thread of the history to which he was listening. Mr. Soland's narration was distinct, and his comments quite triumphant; but the sage whom he addressed said not a word. He looked, indeed, towards Mortimer when the circumstances of the forgery were detailed, but allowed no observation to break in upon the story. 'He is,' replied Mortimer. 'Young gentleman,' said the great lawyer, 'it would post to render you all the help which my professional skill, small as it may be, can do on your behalf. Mr. Soland, continued the ser-geant, reaching his hat, you will not fail to let me have a copy of the indictment as early rid of by a flaw in the proceedings. Mr. Soland, I wish you a good day.' And so saying, the great advocate hastened to his carriage, which was ordered back to London without delay."

Scene on the Stock Exchange.—"Two three-quarters!" What's the meaning of two three-quarters?' said a stripling of some eighteen years, who had wandered into this scene of active business. 'Ninety-two three-quarters,' said a good-natured broker, with an obvious feeling of compassion for the ignorance of his inquirer. 'What is ninety-two three-quarters,'

But now there seemed to be something quite rare: it could not be a battle or a conquest - for profound peace reigned as possible before the trial; for I really feel an throughout the land; it could hardly be a mere interest in the fate of this young gentleman. disturbance—for an event of that sort would We must never despair. Keep up your spirits, never stir up such a commotion as the present: sir, added he, bidding Mortimer farewell; it was an affair, to judge by the riveted gaze of many worse cases than this have been got the multitude, of most unpromising appearance. At this moment, when heads and shoulders were mixed up together in a most motley assembly, a youth, a stranger, who had long watched the party with curiosity, ventured amongst them: but his presence was instantly detected, and no sooner perceived than resented. A general clamour arose; one seized the unhappy intruder by the shoulders, another pulled him by the coat, a third knocked off his hat, and it cannot be ascertained to what extent the violence would have been carried on, had not the young man dexterously extricated himself from his tormentors. Gladly enough again asked the young man. 'Consols, to be did he scamper down the court, into whose sure,' returned the broker, passing quickly precincts he had so incautiously entered; and should be removed to a decent tomb, threaten-

'What do you it is even said, that he felt his pockets as he turned it deliberately, and covered his face think of it?—what do you think of things issued forth from the inhospitable land, fearing that, instead of being punished for his curiosity, he had perchance fallen among thieves. The mysterious conversation still went on; but its purport remained concealed from the public, who continued to stray about the Exchange, buying and selling, as the fancy of each prompted. At length rumours of strange occurrences reached the barrier of that unapproachable spot; and truths, which would have been kept secret had it been possible, were no longer suppressed. It is customary when a failure takes place at the great mart of money, for an individual, appointed to the office, to strike several times against the wall with his hand. This signal announces that bankruptcy has happened: the speculating mob rush together with eagerness to gain the name of the defaulter, and each begins to anticipate the accuracy of his own private surmises. Presently the name is mentioned, and the accounts are of course referred to the all-powerful committee; whilst, if the unfortunate insolvent be a man of note, a hundred tongues are let loose at once, and become profusely slanderous, as jealousy or interest may chance to dictate. 'Bang_bang_bang,' resounded at this time against the wall more than once, or twice, or thrice: the assembly were aghast; no one knew precisely the cause of such united disasters, though whispers of a general bankruptcy were by no means silent. 'Bang—bang—bang. Consols eighty-eight-seven-six - five - four -three_two_one. 'Bang_bang_bang.' Failures for ten, twenty, fifty—one hundred thousand. The public soon participated in the terror — confusion, panic, suspicion, despair, succeeded; and in a very short interval as great an alarm prevailed as when the pretender, of fading memory, was marching to London with his handful of Scots. In a quarter of an hour after the breaking out of the rumour, one thousand pounds were worth a diamond of double their cost; and in a short half hour after that, no ordinary man would advance five

> The Cabinet Cyclopædia. Vol. XXXV. IIistory of Spain and Portugal. Vol. IV. London, 1832. Longman and Co.; Taylor.

THE most interesting volume that has yet appeared of the history of the Peninsula. It contains a luminous view of early Spanish jurisprudence, and a concise but ample biographical account of the first authors of the country and their works. The state of Mahomedan Spain is first treated of, and the writer then proceeds to that under the Christian dominion: the former far exceeding the latter in civilisation. Our object being rather miscellaneous information than investigation, we shall give some amusing miracles of the Virgin; perhaps the most characteristic instances we could choose of the ignorant superstition of the age.

"Milagro the third acquaints us with the death of a devotee, who came to a violent end, and, not being judged worthy to be interred in consecrated ground, was hastily thrown into a ditch. Incensed at the dishonour thus offered to his remains, the Glorious appeared to a priest mands were obeyed. Her will was speedily done: on opening the ditch, a flower of exquisite fragrance was seen growing from the mouth. and the tongue exhibited all the freshness of life. Sometimes she appeared to her dying suppliant, taking care that the soul should be escorted by angels to its eternal reward. Generally, however, her worshippers were too wicked thus summarily to enter heaven, and were fortunate enough to escape, for a time, the doom they deserved. Thus there was a notorious robber by profession, who, with all his crimes, never failed to repeat his Ave, and to bow before the image or picture of Our Lady whenever he saw one. At length he was taken, condemned to be hung, and led away to the gallows, which had been erected for him; there his eyes were covered, the rope adjusted to his neck, and up strive for salvation by better deeds.' he was hoisted, amidst the acclamations of the San Pedro heard this sweet decision, he saw spectators, who exulted in his well-merited punishment. In appearance, no Jack Ketch turned to the devils, that viperous race, and could have done his business more dexterously took from them the soul, much against their or more effectually; so that, after gazing a time, the crowd departed, together with the the monk was restored to life; and though he ministers of justice. On the third day came remained a whole day in a kind of stupor, he the kindred and friends of the culprit to cut down the body and honour it with the rights things he had suffered. 'This was no common of sepulture; but, instead of a corpse, they found the rogue, not merely alive, but merry and laughing. He told them that no sooner had the hangman pulled away the platform, than the Glorious placed her hands under his feet, and held them there as comfortably as if he had been seated in an arm-chair; he would stain, no petition could she make which would have been glad to hang a whole year! The wondrous news flew from mouth to mouth; but some there were who did not believe it. and who exclaimed that he had practised some instance of her maternal care. A monk one trick to escape the gallows and the devil. Again was he clutched by the hand of the law, and sentenced to be beheaded; and again did the Glorious befriend him! in vain did the mained until the approach of evening, when executioners strike; they could not so much as touch him. Astonished at the miracle, they acknowledged the hand of Heaven, and left him It is added, that he amended his in peace. life, and died in a good old age. Milagro the seventh introduces us to another monk, whose fate resembles that of our drowned Benedictine friend. This man neglected every precept of his order, nor did he care for any penance that enemy away. Just, however, as he was beginwas set him; he was, besides, a perfect epicure: in short, his reverence appeared no better than one of the wicked. At length he died as he had lived, 'without taking Corpus Domini or hearing confession,' and, of course, away went the devils with his soul. His fate did devour him. In consternation, he invoked not at first touch Our Lady, merciful as she is wont to be; but St. Peter, in whose monastery he had professed and lived, saw and pitied it, and knelt before the throne of Christ, to procure his release. To most readers what follows may appear to border on impiety; but nothing is more certain, than that the author was incapable of such wickedness, and that he wrote in full assurance of faith. 'My dear Peter,' was the reply, 'well knowest thou what David says, that whosoever would enter on the hill of Sion must be blameless, and without stain of sin. But this one for whom thou kneelest, neither worked righteousness, nor lived without sin: how, therefore, can he merit a seat among the happy on high?' Convincing as was the reply, it did not quell the ardour of the apostle: thinking that other advocates might be more effectual, he employed them to pected, with the same want of success. 'He good man, and well I know he will give thee a cond time, in pilgrim's weeds, with staff in now turned to the Glorious Mother of our heavy penance.' The drunken knave by this hand, he trudged on foot; and on arriving at went in a body to repeat the request; 'and when Don Christo saw the Glorious, and so goodly a procession of her friends, he rose to meet them with a right good will.' Happy the soul which could see such a scene! 'Mother,' said Don Christo, ' much do I wish to know what can have brought you and this fair company.' 'Son,' replied she, 'I come to ask a boon for the soul of a monk in such a monas-'Mother,' returned he, 'most unfit would it be for the soul of such a man to enjoy such happiness as is here: if this were done, then were all holy scripture made of none effect. Yet, through your prayer, we will do something: yea, through love of you, I will do this, - let the soul return to the body in which it dwelt, do penance as becometh a sinner, and that his business was as good as done: he will. In accordance with the divine decree, recovered his senses, and related the wondrous miracle,' adds Berceo. 'Let no one doubt of it in his heart, nor say whether this thing could be or not. Let him place his affections on the Glorious, and soon will he find that we relate nothing contrary to reason. As the Glorious is full of mercy and grace, and free from be denied: how could such a son to such a mother say nay?

"Milagro the twentieth exhibits an equal day entered a wine-shop, and drank so deeply that he could not stand on his legs, but laid himself down on the ground. There he rethe vesper-bell smiting his ear, roused him to something like recollection. With difficulty he raised himself, and staggered along the cloisters towards the door of the church. As he proceeded, what should meet him but the devil. in the shape of a bull, which was preparing to gore him with its horns, when the Glorious descended, and with her mantle scared the ning to ascend the steps, the same devil assailed him, in another form; but the same aid was at hand. The third attack was more serious: a large lion, and fierce as large, obstructed his passage, and opened its jaws to Our Lady's aid; and, as before, she immediately appeared—this time with a large staff in her hand. 'Don Traitor,' said she to the lion, 'hast thou no fear of me? I will now give thee thy deserts, and make thee know what an enemy thou hast dared to brave!' She began lustily to lay on the beast; 'never were his sides so lathered in his life.' 'Don Traitor,' said the Glorious, 'let me again catch thee here, and thou shalt be drubbed still better!' Well pleased was Don Devil to scamper away. and long was it before he was cured of his bruises. Anxious to see her votary in safety, the Glorious took him lovingly by the hand, led him to his dormitory, laid him gently in bed, threw the coverlid over him, put on his art thou, and a little sleep will recover thee. Her praises were soon resounded throughout the monastery, both by night and day."

As a literary specimen, we quote the following from an entertaining analysis of the Poema de Alexandro, written by Juan Lorenzo. The hero has just sent home the news of his success.

"Greatly were his kindred delighted; but no one so much as graybeard Aristotle, who, for joy, leaped three paces at a spring. India is entered, Porus pursued; the elephants are described, and creatures larger than elephants; the country is conquered. But the Greek was not satisfied. 'Don Jupiter,' said he, 'made seven worlds, and I have yet subdued but one.' And of this one he thought he had not seen half: he had heard of the antipodes, and he resolved to seek them by sea. He and his soldiers embarked, were soon lost in the boundless ocean, and assailed by a furious tempest. So great were his dangers and fatigues, that Ulysses was not to be compared with him. As he toiled on the wide waste of waters, the idea suddenly struck him, that he should like to see with his own eyes what the fishes were doing, and how the little ones contrived to live with the great ones. Accordingly, he caused a large glass vessel to be made; entered it, with two of his companions; ordered it to be let down by chains into the water, and not to be raised up until fifteen days were passed. The royal prince was acknowledged by the finny tribe, who swam round his glass habitation, and paid him all possible honour. 'By my faith,' said the king, 'but no prince was ever better at-tended.' When he saw that the strong tyrannised over the weak, that the great fed on the small, he began to moralise. 'It is every where the same: in all places the most powerful does the most evil; and he who has most, wishes for more: birds and beasts, men and fish,-all are alike!' On his return from the watery realms, he continued for some time longer on the deep; but not finding what he wanted, he gave orders that the fleet should steer for land. Don Beelzebub, however, in the fear that he might invade hell, convoked an assembly of the infernal chiefs. 'The Greek king, that flerce conqueror, has subdued every thing,-men, beasts, serpents, and fishes,-and been seeking the antipodes: he intends to break into our realm, and load both me and you with chains. It is written in the Scriptures, that hell shall some time be taken: what time I know not; but let us be upon our guard.' Great, we are told, were the lamentations of the throng on hearing this news: they began to grind their teeth like dogs eager to worry each other. One little devil at length rose, and bade his comrades be of good cheerfor in a very short time the Count Don Antipater should be induced to poison their dreaded enemy. This brings us to the last scenes of Alexander's life. He returned towards Babylon; but in his journey he passed a palace situated on a small island, where dwelt a venerable man, a descendant of Apollo, who night-cap, and said, 'Lie still; for well tired lived on celestial incense. By this sage he was persuaded to go on pilgrimage to two trees, at a small distance, both which could see into make the same request; but, as may be ex-pected, with the same want of success. 'He good man, and well I know he will give thee a cond time, in pilgrim's weeds, with staff in the consecrated spot, one of the prophetic trees | said to him-' My lord, I know your secret thoughts: you wish to rule the whole earth, and it shall be yours; but never shall you return into Greece.' The other added, 'Thou wilt be slain by traitors; poison is prepared for thee ! In vain did he seek to know by what hands it should be administered. 'No, no!' replied the tree, with great sageness; 'if I told thee the traitor's name, thou wouldst be-head him, and the star of fate would not be worth a fig.' As he still journeyed towards Babylon, the desire took him to see the whole earth: he procured two griffins, which carried him over it. The poet does not fail to acquaint us with its shape; it is that of a man. The body is Asia, the eyes are the sun and moon; the arms are the cross, the holy sign of man's redemption; the left leg is Africa, the right is Europe; the skin is formed of the sea; the fish of the soil; the bones are of rocks; the veins are the rivers; the hairs of the head are the grass of the field, in which the poet tells us there is abundant game. Leaving these extravagant fancies, on reaching the end of his journey the first part of the prophecy was ful-filled; ambassadors from all kingdoms were assembled to acknowledge his universal empire, and do him homage. The second part soon had its completion. On a great festival, in which Te Deum laudamus was sung by the people, in presence of the world's emperor, a creature of Antipater threw poison into the imperial goblet, and the kingdoms of the earth were in a few hours without a master."

There is a very pretty vignette by Corbould of the martyrdom of St. Columba, which adds to the great merit of this volume as a contribution to illustrate the most interesting portion of the history of Spain and Portugal.

The Forget Me Not for 1833. Edited by F. Shoberl. London, 1833. R. Ackermann. An old friend with a new face; how many a fair dame would rejoice thus annually to renew her countenance, and, as in this case, for the better! for the Forget Me Not of this year is an improvement on the last. Among the tales, we must specify "Jack Shaddock," by Miss Isabel Hill, a singularly new and vivid sketch to have come from a feminine pen; "Death and the Fisherman," an old legend, but excellently told; and "The Murdered Tinman," a good Americanism. Among the poems, we must particularise Miss Howitt's; there is a grace and originality about them too much wanted in their companions. Next week, if possible, we will give her animated version of "The Goodwives of Wunsberg," from the German of Burger; but we received the volume too late to admit of extract.

Friendship's Offering and Winter's Wreath. A Christmas and New-Year's Present for 1833. Smith, Elder, and Co.

WE must again say, that we received this volume too late for extract; the hasty glance, however, that we have taken shews nothing of either such striking merit or novelty as to make us regret their omission: from this remark we except "The Armada," a bold and spirited poem by Thomas B. Macauley; and "Carl Blewen and the Strange Mariner," is a well-told old legend, by D. Conway; and "The Mysterious Stranger, or the Bravo of Banff," by Leitch Ritchie, one of his very best short stories. "The Old Maids" is good and natural; but we cannot approve of the practice of filling the

There are two or three pretty things by names as yet but little known, while our established writers seem to have exerted themselves in somewhat scant proportion.

The Comic Offering, or Ladies' Mélange for 1833. Edited by L. H. Sheridan. pp. 346. London: Smith, Elder, and Co.

THE influx of Annuals upon us at a late period of the week only affords us an opportunity of saying of Miss Sheridan's third Comic Offering that it is a marked improvement upon her preceding volumes, in humour both literary and graphic. It is as full of puns and witticisms as a plum pudding is full of plums. The articles are shorter than heretofore, and consequently more various and agreeable; for drollery ought never to be too long pursued. Next Saturday we shall exemplify our very favourable opinion; and in the mean time heartily recommend this Offering to every lover of mirth.

Fortsetzung der Correspondenz-Nachricht aus Krakau: Zweite Fortsetzung .- Continuation of Advices from Cracow, &c.

Our readers may remember that in our Gazette of the 28th of July we introduced to them his Majesty Siegfried Justus I. We have just received the two pamphlets, the titles of which are prefixed to our present notice. The first is a sort of exhortation or manifesto of the said king of Israel, addressed to all the inhabitants of the earth. It is tolerably well written; and its morality is of the purest kind, but characterised throughout by the ravings of enthusiasm and fanaticism. Mahometans, Jews, and Christians, are on an equal footing with this lackland potentate; for, although he acknowledges the Saviour, he says that as they all worship the same God, they are of the same religion. The second contains a number of ordinances issued in the name of his said majesty, establishing governments, lieutenancies, &c., and the three orders of knighthood which we formerly mentioned.

MR. SHELDRAKE is the ingenious mechanist whose apparatus for the prevention and cure of spinal curvature is here explained at large; and the work is consequently worthy of the attention of those who are affected by any disease in this important part of the human structure.

A Funeral Address delivered in Southwark Chapel, &c. after the Interment of Dr. Adam Clarke. By Joseph Beaumont. 12mo. pp. 50. London, 1832. Simpkin and Marshall; Baynes and Son; Parker.

FROM this discourse, which we recommend to readers of every denomination, we select an anecdote curious in a literary point of view. When young Clarke was at the Kingswood school, "it was winter (says the preacher), and he was sent into a room to study alone, and without a fire. Looking out of his window one day, he saw some men digging in the garden; and being much annoyed with cold, he went to try to warm himself by breaking the clods after them: whilst thus employed, he found half-a-guinea, which he immediately took to Mr. Bailey, then head master, afterwards Dr. Bailey, of the Old Church at Man-chester. Inquiry being made, it was claimed Pages of an Annual from those of a defunct by one of the masters, to whom it was ac-brought it to Mr. Clarke, declaring that, whether it was his or not, he resolved not to retain it, having been miserable ever since he received it. Mr. Clarke being obliged to take the half-guinea again, disposed of it in procuring books, which, it is believed, laid the foundation of his future eminence as an oriental scholar."

Percival's Anatomy of the Horse. 8vo. pp. 454. London, 1832. Longman and Co. CONTAINING every information which the owner of a horse could desire.

An Essay on the Principles and Constitution of Military Bridges, and the Passage of Rivers in Military Operations. By Major-General Sir Howard Douglas, Bart. K.S.B. C.B., &c. 2d edition. 8vo. pp. circ. 450. London, 1832. T. and W. Boone.

Or this valuable work we expressed a very high opinion when it was first published; and now that the able author has added much important new matter to it, we need only say that it is worthy of his own high reputation as a tactician and military engineer; and that no soldier in Europe can know his business thoroughly without consulting it.

From such as these," it is added, "the Gems of British Landscape will be selected." The first No. contains—> "Dartmouth Castle," "Lyme Regis," and "Hampstead Heath." The views are all executed with great spirit; but, in consequence of that excessive opposition of black and white, which is but too prevalent in mezzotinto plates, they are sadly deficient in the fine quality of art called " keeping."

ORIGINAL POETRY.

DRYBURGH ABBEY.

Twas morn-but not the ray which falls the summer boughs among,

When beauty walks in gladness forth, with all her light and song;

Twas morn but mist and cloud hung deep upon the lonely vale,

And shadows, like the wings of death, were out upon the gale.

For He whose spirit woke the dust of nations into life-

That o'er the waste and barren earth spread flowers and fruitage rife-

Whose genius, like the sun, illumed the mighty realms of mind-

Had fled for ever from the fame, love, friendship of mankind!

To wear a wreath in glory wrought his spirit swept afar,

Beyond the soaring wing of thought, the light of moon or star;

To drink immortal waters, free from every taint of earth-

To breathe before the shrine of life, the source whence worlds had birth!

There was wailing on the early breeze, and darkness in the sky,

When, with sable plume, and cloak, and pall, a funeral train swept by;

Methought-St. Mary, shield us well !- that other forms moved there,

Than those of mortal brotherhood, the noble, young, and fair!

We cannot insert this poem from an old correspondent and a delightful poet, without expressing our admiration of the beauty of the original thought, and of its touching execution. Few tributes to the memory of Scott will draw

DRAMA. DRURY LANE.

With coronach, and arms reversed, forth came THERE are some advantages belonging to the weekly critic which those who live from day to day do not enjoy; though the latter have also some peculiar privileges. For instance, they go hot from the theatre with their opinions hot, which are immediately hot-pressed, and before an author can tell, himself, whether he is a prosperous gentleman or a goblin damned, half the town are well acquainted with the fact either way- and those who read several papers, both ways; for our oracles are by no means wonderful in their agreement. And then the public are so used to this kind of contradiction, that though they are much influenced and led by the daily journals, they seldom or never complain of their deceiving; whereas if an honoured weekly commits the slightest blunder, there is "- to pay, and no pitch hot." But then, as we have confessed, — to pay, and we have our little advantages :- many dramas are dead before our turn comes, and, unless we were dissectors instead of critics, we can save ourselves the trouble of cutting up, or advising cutting down, or any other kind of cutting whatsoever. And we fear that the Factory Girl is one of these unfortunate waifs. It was played last Saturday, and a morning paper assured us, that from its name it might be anticipated that it was not only a domestic but a moral drama. Now, for the life of us, we could not see how the words " the factory girl," indicated a moral, till a punning friend informed us it must be in contradistinction to a man-you-factory girl, which would have predicated immorality; and that, in fact, the title was altogether a misnomer, for as the dénouement turned upon a flower, it ought to have been the ol-factory. We answered, that Cawee, Balls, Briadal, &c., played with much spirit.

Was it a dream ?-how oft, in sleep, we ask, Whilst graceful as a lonely fawn, 'neath covert | a tulip had no scent; but he said that did not signify, for in the drama it was raised from some seed the artisan had preserved, whereas, except upon the stage tulips were propagated by bulbs. The truth of the matter, however, is, that Mr. Jerrold did not succeed in this attempt, which we hope will not discourage a writer of his talent from pursuing his dramatic course. It is a most difficult thing to handle the pathetic and tragic in every-day life; and either above, or below, or one side of the mark, is a failure. The least coarseness revolts the mind, the slightest inconsistency dispels the illusion of actual distressthe only appeal to the feelings. Mr. Jerrold's aim is a noble one - to abate selfishness and hard-hearted disregard of human suffering; but we are not sure that the subjects he chooses, and his mode of treating them, are the best adapted to the end he has in view. There are many great and rich people of tolerable humanity - some landlords who do not crush their tenants,-yea, though dangerous to hint it in these times, a few really Christian and benevolent parsons; while on the other score there are some infamous and ungrateful scamps among the lower orders - some tenants who deserve to be turned adrift - and some factory girls no better than they should be-no offence to Miss Phillips, who was really better than she should be in the character, with her twolips and all! But the plot was bad, the incidents improbable, and the catastrophe impotent. And thus it comes that we, having said so much of nothing, have nothing to say of the Factory Girl.

On Tuesday after the Jealous Wife, cast with a comic force worthy of the better days of the regular and legitimate drama, a one-act comic entertainment, from the pen of Don T. de Trueba, and called Mr. and Mrs. Pringle, was performed. If continual laughter be a test of success, this little piece was most successful. It is just such a smart and lively thing, with pleasant dialogue, and admirably acted, as we have seen at the Variétés in Paris; to which genus it unquestionably belongs, from its resemblance to La Famille Jabutot, or La Veuve sans Enfans, lately executed there, but without a Farren to sustain, so inimitably, the principal part.+ The story is simple enough,—Mr. Pringle marries not to have a family, and he finds himself surrounded by a very numerous one ready made. Their appearance, his annoyance and despair, and all the etcetera of needy sons-in-law and noisy grand-children, make a ludicrous scene; and the writer deserves great credit for the talent with which he has fitted it for representation. That talent we are glad to hear furnishes a comedy, The Man of Pleasure, to be brought out immediately at this theatre. If M. Trueba can get audiences to laugh as cordially through five acts as through this one, he will tire them enough.

On Wednesday Pizarro did not draw no house; and we should have wondered if it had, notwithstanding the splendid Rolla of Macready. On Thursday the Freischutz, as a first. was rather odd, after our having it so often as a last piece; but it had the voice of Braham, a sufficient recommendation, and a bumping house rewarded his spirited exertions with immense applause.

^{*} Mr. Oakley, Mr. Macready; Major Oakley, Mr. Cooper; Russett, Mr. Farren; Sir Harry Beagle, Mr. Harley; Paris, Mr. J. Russell; Captain O'Cutter, Mr. Power; Mrs. Oakley, Mrs. Glover; Lady Freelove, Miss Kenneth; and Harriet, with a number of the characters from Sir Walter Scott's dramatised novels, in honour of their departed creator. Who, after Shakespeare, has better deserved such a tribute?

COVENT GARDEN.

On Monday Mr. Butler, a provincial performer of deserved celebrity, made his London début as Hamlet; a part so full of traditions, recollections, and comparisons, that we can only consider it, as we do, a school exercise-a thing to see if the boy has the right ability and feeling to entitle him to undertake a leading line in tragedy. We do not like to pledge ourselves on a single trial of this kind; but we may safely say that Mr. Butler displayed perfect acquaintance with the stage, a tolerable conception of Hamlet, and most of the qualities which, with judicious culture and management, constitute an actor. He is tall, and consequently, like poor Conway (but we trust without his highly sensitive feelings), obnoxious to little critics; his countenance is expressive, and his voice (though it failed him in the louder efforts) The first three acts were very satisfactorily done: the last two not so well.

OLYMPIC.

THE novelty of the week here was Miss Murray, whose essay at Richmond we noticed in a manner which indicated our anticipation of her future excellence in the best walks of comedy. On Tuesday she appeared in the character of Mary Dobbs, in My Daughter, Sir, a burletta by Planché, originally performed at the Haymarket. On the first night we can only speak in praise of the beauty of the fair débutante; for her trepidation was too great to allow her to exhibit her talents in acting. But, on the Wednesday, when the piece was repeated far more correctly, she fully justified our hopes. Strikingly handsome, lady-like, animated, a sweet figure, playful expression, and pleasing voice, she played the part delightfully, and was cheered throughout with deserved applause. So young and so new to the stage, we observed no fault which a little practice will not amend. Of these, rather studied positions and artificial airs in tripping or walking, must be abandoned for ease and greater quietude - repose is far more effective than motion. Miss M. must also dress for her character, and not for herself. Mary, in a country morning dress, ought not to have a bare neck, however lovely, nor bare arms, however graceful. Mademoiselle Mars would have worn a neat high and long-sleeved gown; and then the contrast to the finery would have been infinitely better. These, however, are but hints; and we congratulate the town on so fair and promising an accession to its dramatic enjoyment.

UNBEHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

HAYMARKET, October 5th. - Kean in Sir Giles Overreach gave his ring to Alworth, and sent him to his chaplain to marry Lord Lovel and Margaret, when the former was on the stage, and Alworth was only going with a letter from him to the latter. For consistency's sake Mr. Kean omitted this in the subsequent scene where it was required. Margaret (Mrs. Ashton), by forgetting to answer her father's advice with

"I have heard this is the wanton's fashion, sir, Which I must never learn," cut Mr. Kean out of a speech wherein he makes one of his most striking points. Mrs. Glover, as Lady Alworth, declining the trouble of Monday, having had a very indifferent season.

Welborn. Kean was forced to omit the lines

"The garments of her widowhood laid by, She now shines forth as lovely as the spring;" and the effect of all the scenes dependent on this necessary change was marred in like manner. In that scene of Second Thoughts wherein Mrs. Hill enters à la shabby-genteel, Mrs. Glover exclaimed, impromptu, "Heavens! where did she get such a bonnet?" and Mrs. Humby, though in the supposed character of a lady of high ton, actually added, "Yes, ma, it is indeed a shocking bad bonnet!" I was more sorry than surprised to find that a general hiss from all parts of the house assailed the fair pronouncer of this exploded vulgarism.

Covent Garden, October 8th .- Did the gentlemen of Denmark in Hamlet's time wear the same dresses as those of Venice in Shylock's time? If not, either the play of Hamlet or that of the Merchant of Venice is incorrectly dressed at this theatre. The four worthies who brought in Ophelia's coffin wore the watchmen's coats used in a former pantomime, which, disparting as they lowered it into the earth, betrayed that they enveloped the forms of the red-breeched footmen of the theatre. Mr. Butler, as Hamlet, dashed his mother's picture with such violence on the stage, that it skipped along till it reached the stage-box, into which it cleanly leaped and fairly disappeared.

Drury Lane, October 9th.—The part sus-tained by Miss Cawse in Mr. and Mrs. Pringle is named by its author (Don Trueba) Clarissa Robinson; why then did Mr. Balls call her Clarissa Harlowe 3

Sir W. Scott .- Last week a meeting of the friends and admirers of Sir Walter Scott took place at Mr. Murray's, in Albemarle-street, when Lord Dover was called to the chair; and, after some conversation, it was agreed to appoint a committee of noblemen and gentlemen to consider of the best means of testifying their respect for the memory of the mighty dead. Since that period many distinguished persons have been associated in the design, the particulars of which we trust very speedily to communicate to the public.

Alexander Barry, Esq. F.R.S.—This gentle man, the lecturer on Natural Philosophy and Chemistry at Guy's Hospital, has fallen a sacrifice to his love of science. He was dreadfully injured in making an experiment some weeks since at his chambers in Furnival's Inn, and died in consequence, after severe sufferings, on Sunday last.

David Jones, the Welsh poet, and not the individual whose locker is mentioned by sailors, died last month, aged sixty-nine, at Rhuddlan, Flintshire; in the church of which place he annually sung a carol of his own composing on Christmas day during the last fifty-three years.

Captain Look, an amateur artist of great talent, perished recently by the upsetting of a pleasure-boat in the Lake of Como.

Sir Walter Scott.—At a public meeting at Edinburgh, attended by distinguished men of all parties, and at which several interesting speeches were delivered, a subscription was opened for a monument to be erected in that capital to the memory of this immortal author. A considerable sum was instantly raised, and has since been largely augmented.

Earthquake in Nova Scotia.-A severe shock of an earthquake was experienced in Nova Scotia on the 12th of August. It lasted about a minute. The last on record in that quarter is of the 22d of May, 1817.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

E. C. must be mistaken in thinking our reference to Mr. Dillon's work could be considered other than a harmless pleasantry. We have no doubt but that gentleman is an ornament to the church.

Observer' is referred to Lit. Gaz. No. 709, article "Miscellaneous Notes on Eclipses," where he will find the following paragraph:—"The darkness that occurred at the crucifixion, and which continued three hours, cannot be attributed to an eclipse of the sun, the passover being kept at the time of the full moon: had even the two luminaries been in conjunction, the darkness could only have lasted four or five minutes, owing to their apparent diameters being so nearly equal."

The aspect of this No. of our Gazette reflects the literature of the day, almost entirely light and evanescent. It is remarkable how very few sterling and lasting works are now published.

It is remarkable now very rew sterling and lasting works are now published.

We have allowed our reviews this week to trespass over their usual space; but there was little of interest in other branches of our miscellany to press for immediate insertion, and we are yet much in arrear with new publications.

gelivered at the Royal Academy.

By the late HENRY FUNELI, P.P.

Now first published from the original MSS.

"The new Lectures are equally worthy with the first of the fame of Fuseli, and of the study of the artist, to whom they will afford the most valuable instruction. To the student they throw a stronger light upon the glorious achievements of the great masters, while they afford to the connoisseur a wider basis, and a more lofty standard by which to appreciate the merits of various degrees and qualities of excellence."—Spectator.

HE TALES Of SHARSPEARE, designed for the Use of Young Persons. The 5th edition.

By CHARLES LAMB.

9, These Tales are meant to be submitted to the young reader as an introduction to the study of Shakspeare, for which purpose his words are used whenever it seemed possible to bring them in; and in whatever has been added to give them the regular form of a connected story, diligent care has been taken to select such words as might least interrupt the effect of the beautiful English tongue in which he wrote; therefore, words introduced into our language since his time have been, as far as possible, avoided.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

Memoir and Correspondence of the late Sir James Edward Smith, M.D. F.R.S. &c. Edited by Lady Smith. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. Longman and Co.

Two volumes filled with the correspondence of the greatest botanists and philosophers of the past generation with a man so distinguished in science as Sir James Edward Smith, must possess much to gratify the scientific world. But it has never fallen to our lot to meet with a publication of which we can convey so slight a knowledge to the public, either by analysis or extract. Every letter relates to different subjects; and the notices of discoveries of plants, and other incidents, are so brief, that it is impossible for us to force them into any critical arrangement. We must therefore rest contented with a most imperfect and desultory sketch, from the materials brought together in these two volumes by the conjugal affection of his surviving lady.

Sir James E. Smith was born in 1759, at Norwich (a city which has produced many eminent persons, and to this day evinces much intellectual and literary superiority within its circle), and at a very early age displayed much precocity of talent. At eighteen his predilection for botany was strongly developed, and his studies were ever after directed to that branch, though educated at Edinburgh to the medical profession. Of this we find a proof in a letter to his father, dated 11th March, 1782, where he says :-- " Mr. Martineau advises me to get into the Medical Society; but there is a law made, that no more can be admitted this year. The Earl of Buchan was made an honorary member last Saturday; but that is an extraordinary thing. I always find means to get in as a visitor: I was there last Saturday fortnight, and spoke twice, from which I hope you will think I have got rid of some of my mauvaise honts. The members were disputing on the analogy of the diseases of brutes with those of men, and how far the method of cure which succeeds in theirs might be applied to ours. I ventured to represent the danger which might happen from trusting too much to this analogy, considering that many plants are poisonous to some animals and wholesome to others, of which I gave several instances. The president very politely thanked me for my observations. I find they are wonderfully ignorant of natural history; and even my little knowledge of the subject gives me an importance which I hope will be of great advantage, and may perhaps in some measure atone for my deficiency in classical learning.

In this year he, in conjunction with some young friends, founded a Natural History Society in the Scottish capital, the prototype of the Linnean, which, only a few years later, emanated from him in London. He says, in a letter of April 15:

-, myself, and four or five friends, who have a turn for natural history, have lately formed a society for the prosecution of that returned home, and sent a vessel to the Sound most general defection, he, who may be con-

study. Dr. Walker, the new professor, who is | to intercept its voyage; but happily it was too a most amiable, worthy, and ingenious man, no sooner heard of it than he offered us his museum to meet in, with the use of his books and specimens; and he begged to be admitted an ordinary member, which he accordingly was, and about seven young men besides. Dr. Hope was made an honorary member, as he cannot often attend us; but Dr. Walker, who has no business to follow but natural history, foresees the consequence this society may be of to him, and is resolved to support it as much as possible. Several men of genius and rank have petitioned to be admitted as ordinary members, among whom are the Earls of Glasgow and Ancram, and Lord Dacre, son to the Earl of Selkirk,—three young noblemen of fine parts and great fortunes. We have had two public meetings: at the first Dr. Walker was president, and at the last I had that honour; and the other members are to take it in turn : four visitors are admitted every night. We meet every Friday evening, from six to nine o'clock; and two papers are to be produced and discussed at every meeting, the members taking it in turn to write them. I did not accept the office of president without great anxiety; but I went through it with credit, as I knew the power I held, which is absolute for the time in all societies. I have great hopes that this will be a most respectable and useful institution, and am very proud of having been one of its first founders.

Throughout life Sir James was no enemy to fun and drollery; his disposition was very amiable, and his pursuits attractive; so that it is not a matter of surprise, that in Edinburgh first, and afterwards wherever he was, his progress in society was of a delightful kind, and his friends numerous and intelligent, gentlemen and scholars.

On completing his studies in the North, he came to London; and in 1784 became the pur-chaser of the cabinet and MSS. of the celebrated Linnæus. This gave the colour to all his future days, and is thus noticed in the work before us, to his father, June 18:

"Honoured sir, __this day I received the longwished-for letter from Sweden. It contains an accurate inventory of the insects and shells, with the number of species in every genus, by which it appears that these collections are truly noble, even beyond what I could expect. The species of insects are in all 3198; of shells 1564, and 200 more not arranged: there is also a fine collection of minerals; of these there are 2424 specimens; among them are 108 silver and 31 gold ones, &c. &c. There are 45 birds in glass cases. The bargain is concluded with me on these terms, -Baron Alströmer is to have the small herbarium, and I am to give 900 guineas for the rest."

A good deal of difficulty attended the negotiation so fortunately concluded; and "the ship which was conveying this valuable cargo had just sailed, when the king of Sweden, Gustavus III., who had been absent in France, late. At the end of October 1784, the packages were safely landed at the custom-house. The whole cost of the collection, including the freight, was 10881. 5s."

Sir J. Smith was subsequently elected a F.R.S., and made a pretty extensive tour on the continent; of an account of which tour, and the correspondence during its continuance, a considerable portion of the first volume consists. A sketch of the former was published; and though agreeable to his Whig friends, some of the passages seem to have been disrelished by the opposite party, especially a notice of Rousseau, and the application of the epithet Messalina to the unfortunate Queen of France.

In 1788 Sir James removed from Chelsea, where he had settled with his botanical treasures, to Great Marlborough Street, to practice as a physician. It was here he formed the Linnman Society.

"With the assistance of Sir Joseph Banks, Dr. Goodenough, Mr. Marsham, and a few others, this object was carried into effect; and the first meeting of its members was held at his own house in Great Marlborough Street, on the 8th of April, 1788, on which occasion Sir James delivered 'A Discourse on the Rise and Progress of Natural History,'-an animated and most instructive address, auspicious of the prosperity of the new-formed institution, and which affords a convincing proof that the study of nature is not a tasteless and insipid one. He was at the same time appointed president of the community, which was designated by the appropriate name of 'The Linnman Society.' 'I consider myself,' he observed, 'as a trustee of the public, and hold these treasures only for the purpose of making them useful to the world and natural history in general, and particularly to this Society, of which I glory in having contributed to lay the foundation, and to the service of which I shall joyfully consecrate my labours, so long as it continues to answer the purposes for which it is designed.' This institution, venerable now by its duration, approaching to half a century, has enrolled among its members from the beginning, names illustrious as well by high birth as by high claims to scientific distinction, in France, and Holland, and Ger-many; in Switzerland, in Italy, in Spain, as well as in England; and in its later days the catalogue is swelled with names from America and India."

Sir James also distinguished himself by delivering lectures on botany at his own home, and at Guy's Hospital, for many years, which were much and highly followed, and tended greatly to promote a general love of this pure and fascinating study. In 1802, the Society was incorporated by royal charter; and we quote a passage concerning it.

"At a period when the illustrious individual, in whose honour the Linnæan Society was founded, is assailed on all sides, it will be interesting to know, that, unmoved by the al-sidered as his principal representative, still were enclosed excited the suspicions of the continued to advocate the principles of the immortal Swedish naturalist; and this unaltered adherence Sir James expressed in his last introductory lecture at the London Institution in 1825, as well as in the concluding pages of his latest printed work, the English Flora, where the author alludes to 'principles too little studied by the pursuers of superabundant discrimination, instead of philosophical combinations. This,' he asserts, ' is the bane of natural science at the present day: hence the filum Ariadneum is lost, or wilfully thrown away, and a bandage darkens the sight of the teacher no less than that of the student.' Sir James cannot be said to stand alone and unsupported in his opinion. 'The question,' he remarks, of the natural or artificial character of Jussieu's system, has been ably discussed by the celebrated Mr. Roscoe in the Transactions of the Linnaan Society, vol. xi. p. 50, who, in shewing that this method involves several as unnatural assemblages as the Dprofessedly artificial system of Linnaus, contends that little is to be gained by its adoption Norwich, for consolation. It was winter, and with respect to a conformity to nature.' And about six o'clock when he arrived. Mr. Kinin the fifteenth volume of the Society's Transactions, Mr. Bicheno, in a paper on Systems and Methods in Natural History, observes, that the two great masters of botanical science (Linneus and Jussieu) propose different conductions and descriptions of the proposed of the control of the conduction of the control of the co ferent ends, and ought not to be regarded as rivals. Division and separation are the ends of the artificial system; to establish agreements, is the end of the natural.' Following the same idea, the Rev. E. B. Ramsay, in a biographical notice of his lamented friend, printed in the Edinburgh Journal of Science, young botanists are more mistaken than in their ideas of natural classification. often imagine they have only to commence the study of natural arrangements, and become at once profound philosophical botanists. one of the signs of the times,—a desire to grasp at general results and conclusions without a previous study in detail. The error in this case is putting the natural and artificial methods in opposition to each other; whereas it appears to be the object of the artificial system to collect materials to form a natural one. But it has been of late spoken of rather as something quite superseded—as something to give way to a new and a nobler structure, built upon a foundation entirely different.'"

"The Kinderley family having been mentioned in a former page, it may not be uninteresting in this place to relate the following anecdote, which an old servant, who had lived fifty-two years with Mrs. Kinderley and her daughter Mrs. Smith, frequently repeated as a fact with which she was well acquainted, and in part a witness of. The Rev. John Kinderley's connexion with Scotland had procured him the acquaintance of several families in the north, among whom Lord D—— was one of his most intimate friends. This nobleman had met with a lady at Bath, both young and attractive, and who passed for the widow of an officer. His lordship becoming attached to this lady, he married her, and they soon after left England to reside on the Continent. Here, after a few years, she was seized with an alarming illness, and earnestly desired her lord, in case of her death, that she might be conveyed to England and interred in a particular church, which she named. Upon this event taking place, Lord D_ - accompanied the body in the same ship, and, upon landing at Harwich, the chest in which the remains of his lady custom-house officers, who insisted upon ascertaining its contents. Being a good deal shocked with such a threat, Lord D—— proposed that it should be removed to the church, and opened in the presence of the clergyman of the parish, who could vouch for its containing what he assured them was within. Accordingly the pro-posal was yielded to, and the body conveyed to the appointed place, when, upon opening the chest, the attending minister recognised in the features of the deceased his own wife! and communicated the unwelcome discovery to his lordship on the spot. It appeared, upon further conversation, that Lady D—— had been married against her inclination to this person, and, determining to separate entirely from him, had gone he knew not whither, and under an assumed name and character had become the wife of Lord D-The two husbands followed her remains to the grave the next day; and on the same evening Lord -, in great distress of mind; attended by one servant, came to his friend's house, in derley was called out to speak to a stranger, and returning to his wife, desired her to leave them together, pretending that a stranger from Scotland was arrived on particular business. Lord D-sat up with Mr. Kinderley the whole night, to unbosom his affliction and extraordinary fate to his friend; and, at daybreak, in order to avoid any interview with his host's family, for which his spirits were unequal, he departed."

At the end of the Correspondence, which reaches to nearly 400 pages in the second voobserves, that 'there is no point on which lume, and comprehends many foreigners of the greatest celebrity, there is an apology (we use the word in the right sense, as used by the Bishop of Llandaff) for the religious opinions of Sir James Smith. But as we rarely trespass upon such topics, we shall merely notice that this esteemed individual died on the 17th of March, 1828, having produced many botanical works which have highly elevated his own character and the character of his country, and tended widely to spread the cultivation of that science to which he was devotedly attached throughout a long life.

> The New Year's Gift, and Juvenile Souvenir. Edited by Mrs. Alaric A. Watts. London, 1833. Longman and Co.

A very pretty volume, and exceedingly well adapted to its class of readers. The stories are various, and blend information and amusement; while the poems are lively and musical. The family of the Howitts have been most valuable contributors; there is a simplicity and good feeling about their writings which has a charm much easier felt than described. Summer-day's Adventure of three School-boys" is a delightful tale; so is " a Day in an Island." "The Pleasures of Industry," by Mrs. Alaric Watts, is a most prettily turned lesson; "Rhymes of the Cards," very ingenious, by Miss Emma Roberts; and we would also mention "The Turnpike-gate," by H. F. Chorley; "Mary and Martha." To only one do we positively object, viz. "Dolly's Beaux;" there is a premature affectation in it which we dislike exceedingly; and something worse than absurd in the following quotation as applied to a child of four years disappointed in a romp.

"Sigh no more, ladies sigh no more; Men were deceivers ever; One foot on sea, and one on shore, To one thing constant never."

We quote the following touching little poem, "The Wanderer's Return," by Mary Howitt. "There was a gentle Provence girl, Fresh as a flower in May,
Who breath a spreading plane-tree sat
Upon a summer day,
And thus unto a mourner young
In a low voice did she say: — 'And said I, I shall dance no more;
For though but young in years,
I knew, what makes men wise and sad,
Affection's ceaseless fears,
And that dull aching of the heart
Which is not eased by tears. But sorrow may not always last, God keeps the meek in view;
Mine is a simple tale, dear friend,
Yet will I tell it you;
A simple tale of household grief, And household gladness too. My father in the battle died,
And left young children three;
My brother Marc, a noble lad,
With spirit bold and free,
More kind than common brothers are,
And Isabelle and me. When Marc had sixteen summers seen, When Marc had sixteen summers
A tall youth and a strong,
Said he, 'I am a worthless drone
I do my mother wrong:
I'll out and win the bread I eat...
I've burdened you too long!' Oh! many tears my mother shed, And earnestly did pray That he would still abide with us And be the house's stay, And be like morn unto her eyes, As he had been alway. But Marc he had a steadfast will, A purpose fixed and good, And caimly still, and manfully, Her prayers he long withstood; Until at length she gave consent, Less willing than subdued. 'Twas on a shining morn of June He rose up to depart— I dared not to my mother shew The sadness of my heart;
We said farewell, and yet farewell,
As if we could not part. There seemed a gloom within the house, Although the bright sun shone: There was a want within our hearts; For the blithest, dearest one Had said farewell that morn of June, Had said fareweil that morn of June,
And from our sight was gone.
Ere long, most doleful tidings came,
Sad tidings of dismay—
The plague was in the distant town,
And hundreds died each day;
We thought, in truth, poor Marc would die
'Mid strangers far away. Weeks passed, and months, and not a word Came from him, to dispel The almost certainty of death Which o'cr our spirits fell; My mother drooped from fear, which grew Each day more terrible. Each day more terrible.

'At length,' said she, 'l'll see my son,
In life if yet he be,
Or else the turf that covers him !'
Then sank she on her knee,
And clasped her hands in silent prayer,
And wept most piteously. And wept most piteously.

She went unto the distant town,

Still asking every where

For tidings of her long-lost son;

In vain she made her prayer;

All were so full of wo themselves,

No pity had they to spare. No pity had they to spare.

To hear her tell that tale would move
The sternest heart to bleed;
She was a stranger in that place,
And none of her took heed;
And broken hearted she came back,
A bowed and bruised reed. A owed and runsed regrow,
More sunken, by the reye;
More sunken, by the reye;
And to my soul assurance came
That she was near to die,
And hourly was my earnest prayer
Put up for her on high. Oh, what a we seem'd then to us
The friendless orphans' fate!
I dared not picture to my mind
How drear, how desolate—
And, like a frightened thing, my heart
Shrank from a pang so great!

We rarely left my mother's side;
'Twas joy to touch her hand,
And with unwearying, patient love,
Beside her couch to stand,
To walt on her, and every wish
Unspoke to understand.

At length, O joy beyond all joys! When we believed him dead, One caim and sunny afternoon, As she lay on her bed, In quiet sleep, methought below I heard my brother's tread. I rose, and on the ascending stair I saw himself—no other, More beautiful than ere before, My tall and manly brother!
I should have swooned, but for the thought
Of my poor sleeping mother. or my poor seeping mones.

I cannot tell you how we met;
I could not speak for weeping;
Nor had I words enough for Joy,
My heart within seem'd leaping;
I should have screamed, but for the thought
Of her who there lay sleeping. That Marc returned in Joy to us,
My mother dreamed e'en then,
And that prepared her for the bliss
Of meeting him again:
To tell how great that bliss, would need
The tongue of wisest men! His lightest tone, his very step,
More power had they to win
My drooping mother back to life
Than every medicine;
She rose again like one arisen
From the grave where he had been. From the grave where ne near cook.
The story that my brother told
Was long and full of joy;
Scarce to the city had he come,
A poor and friendless boy,
Than he met. by chance, a merchant good, Than he met, by chance, a mercl From whom he asked employ. The merchant was a childless man; Ine merchant was a childress man; and in my brother's face
Something he saw that moved his heart
To such unusual grace:
'My son,' said he, 'is dead; wilt thou
Supply to me his place?' Even then, bound to the golden East, His ship before them lay; And this new bond of love was formed There, standing on the quay:
My brother went on board with him,
And sailed that very day! The letter that he wrote to us
Did never reach our hand;
And while we drooped with anxious love,
He gained the Indian strand, nd saw a thousand wondrous things in that old, famous land. In that Old, Harrous Balla.

And many rich and curious things,
Bright bird and pearly shell,
He brought, as if to realise
The tales he had to tell.
My mother smiled, and wept, and smiled,
And listened, and grew well! The merchant loved him more and more. The merchant leved him more and mo And did a father's part, And blessed my brother for the leve That healed his wounded heart; He was a friend that Heaven had sent, Kind mercy to impart. So do not droop, my gentle friend, Whom grief has burdened sore; Look up to God, for he hath love And comfort in great store, And moveth ofttimes human hearts To bless us o'er and o'er!"

The new binding is equally handsome and durable—it is a prettily ornamented scarlet moreone.

Illustrations of Political Economy. No. IX. Ireland. A Tale. By Harriet Martineau. C. Fox. London, 1832. A PICTURE equally true and terrible—industry unrequited, and thereby made desperate—ignorance, which want so easily drives to crime—famine, sickness, and death—such are the familiar events in these pages; and who but must admit that they are indeed the familiar events in Ireland? We shall give one scene, which we must preface by observing, that Dan and Dora were an industrious young couple; but the husband rendered reckless, and the wife desponding, by a series of distresses which have driven them to seek a refuge among the hills. A vessel has been wrecked on the coast, which leads to a frightful night of plunder and murder. "Dan was among the plunderers. He was not at liberty to decline any enterprise proposed by the captain of the gang with which he had associated himself; and on his return from a distant expedition, which had detained him from his home for some days, he found himself called upon, in fulfilment of his oath, to take part in a scene of plunder, of a kind which he abhorred, in sight of his own dwelling. While he was ordered to rob middlemen, terrify agents, and half-murder tithe-proctors, he discharged his mission with hearty good will, un-der the notion of avenging his own wrongs: but it was quite a different thing to delude foreigners, put them in peril of their lives, and strip them of every thing; and he said so. In reply, he was reminded of his oath (an oath too solemn to be slighted), and immediately commanded, as a test of obedience, to take up a bale of goods from the wreck, and carry it up to find house-room in his cabin. He did so with a heavy heart, dreading thus to meet Dora, after a separation of some days. She had never yet seen him equipped as a whiteboy, or been expressly told what occupation he followed. He paused outside, leaning against the doorless entrance to watch what was passing within.

All was so strange and fearful, that a deadly horror came over him, lest the one whom he saw moving about should not be the real Dora, but some spirit in her likeness. She was employed about her mother's corpse, which lay on the bare ground. Her motions were so rapid as to appear almost convulsive. Now she kneeled beside the body, straightening the limbs, and striving in vain to cover it completely with a piece of linen which was too small for the purpose; now she fixed her one rush-light in a lump of clay, and placed it at the head; now she muttered from beneath the hair which fell over her face as she stooped; and then, leaning back, uttered the shrill funeral cry with a vehemence which brought some colour back to her ashy pale countenance. 'Whist, whist!' muttered she impatiently to herself. 'I have given the cry, and nobody comes. Father Glenny forgot me long ago, and my own father has forgot us, and Dandon't know what has been done to Dan, and he tells nobody. He won't forget me long, however.' 'Forget you, Dora!' said Dan, gently, as he laid hold of her clock. 'Did I keep my oath so long when you lived in your father's cabin in the glen, and shall I forget you now?' She folded her arms in her cloak with a look of indifference, as she glanced at the bale he carried. 'O, you have brought a sheet, as I was wanting,' said she; ' but where are the candles? I have but this one; and nothing in the way of a shutter or a door, you see; and there's no company come yet; so you will have time. Make haste, Dan.' 'Shall I bid the neighbours to the wake?' inquired Dan, who thought the best way of gaining her attention was to help her to fulfil first the duties to the dead, which rank so high among social obligations in Ireland. At a sign from her he threw down his load, and hastened to the beach, whence he brought a plank, on which to lay the body, candles wherewith to illuminate the bier, and spirits with which to exercise hospitality. He gave notice, at the same time, to his captain and comrades, that when a blaze should be seen on the cliff, and the funeral lament heard, all would be ready for their reception at the wake : - the burning of the bed of the deceased before the door, and the utterance of the death-cry, being the cus-tomary mode of invitation to the wakes of the Irish poor. Dan was yet more struck with the death-like paleness of his wife's face when he again joined her. He inquired whether any neighbours had helped her to nurse her mother, and whether her rest had been much broken: but she scarcely attended to his questions. She clapped her hands, as if in glee, at sight of what he brought, and seemed altogether so much more like a wilful child than like his thoughtful and devoted Dora, that fancy again crossed him that some mocking fiend had taken possession of her form. He asked her, with much internal trembling, whether she had duly prayed this night? She started, and said she had strangely forgotten herself; and forthwith went through her customary devotions in a way which, though hurried, was very unlike any which a fiend would dare to attempt; and Dan was so far satisfied. 'Bring out the bed,' said she, pointing to the straw on which her mother had been wont to lie. 'While it is burning, I will raise the cry once more, and see if any one will come.' Dan moved a bundle which lay on the straw, but let it go again in a pang of horror when the feeble cry of an infant proceeded from it. In an instant he understood all. He took up the child, and placed it on Dora's bosom without saying a word. O, my child! ay, I forgot it when I forgot my prayers; but it cannot have been hungry long, I'm thinking. Hold him while I strip off my cloak that keeps me as hot as if I had a fire burning within me.' And she carelessly slipped the babe into her husband's arms. 'O Dora!' cried he in a choking voice, 'is this the way you give a child of ours into my arms for the first time?' She looked at him with perplexity in her countenance, said she knew no-thing at all about it, and before he could prevent her, set fire to the straw, and gave the other appointed signal. Up came the company of whitehoys, crowding round the cabin, rushing to the bier, and exciting Dora more and more every moment by their looks and their proceedings. She now, for the first time, perceived the peculiarity of her husband's dress. She went from one to another, observing upon the arms they carried, and stopped at last before Dan, who was in earnest conversation with his captain. 'So you have enrolled yourself, Dan! So you have plighted and pledged yourself to your band since you swore you would wed me only! Much may they do for you that I could not do! but O, may they never do you the evil that I would not do! They may give you clothes these winter nights, when I have nothing warmer at home for you than my own heart. They may find you whisky and lights for the wake, and other things as you want them; but they will make you pay more than you ever paid to me, Dan. They will take you among snares in the night: they will set you on other men's beasts to go over bogs where you will sink, and under rocks that will crush you: they will set you where bullets are flying round you; they will put a knife in your hand, and make you dip your soul in blood. If you refuse, they will burn you and me together within four walls; and if you agree, they will lead you on to something worse than bogs or rocks, or a soldier's shot: they will send you to be set before the judge, and refused mercy, and then __ ' 'For Christ's sake stop her!' exclaimed Dan. He seized her hands to prevent her stripping his whiteboy uniform from his shoulders, as soon as he had given his baby in charge to a compassionate by stander. Move the corpse,' ordered the captain. 'Keep the wake down below, and bring the first woman you can meet with, to tend this poor creature. Clear the cabin instantly.' 'Give the word, captain,' cried one, 'and we'll catch a doctor—the same that we brought blindfold when O'Leary was murthered almost. We'll whip noon.' 'No, no; not till we see what the women say. Hilloo, boys! bring out the bier fair and easy, and decent.' Dora's struggles to follow were fierce, and her cries at being kept from this duty heart-rending. No one could effectually quiet her till she had been some hours committed to the care of a matron, who was brought from some invisible place to nurse her. Slowly and sadly she recovered. Some said she was never again the same Dora; but others saw no farther change than the melancholy which was likely to become fixed in her by such an experience as her's. She could never recall any circumstances connected with the death of her mother and the birth of her child. She could only suppose, as her husband did, that the old woman's exertions had sufficed for her daughter, and been fatal to herself.'

Again we heartily praise these valuable works; it is both a duty and a pleasure to commend them to public favour.

The Comic Offering. Smith and Elder. HAVING given our opinion of this Offering to Momus, we only return to it in order to corroborate our judgment by extract and illustration. There is a very quiet vein of humour in the story of the Flybekins.

" The Flybekins were distant connexions of the great Lord B., living 'genteelly' in the west of England; and Mr. and Mrs. Flybekin were the only adult members of the family at the period of the incident which gave rise to this anecdote. It happened once that these country cousins' were possessed with an uncontrollable desire to enter within the hitherto unapproached circle of London fashion and gaiety, in which their noble relatives moved with such distinction. Every thing was propitious in furtherance of the meditated scheme: the spring was approaching, London filling, the country emptying, and the children could all go to school. A few weeks 'in town, just to see what was going on,' would be fully worth the journey, especially as it would afford an opportunity for them to commence an acquaintance with their magnificent relations: and as the boys were growing up, it might be serviceable to their interests to tighten the bonds of connexion a little, which had, from lapse of time, and want of intercourse, become somewhat loosened. There is an old sayingwhere there is a will, there is always a way." In a short time Mr. and Mrs. Flybekin, being bent on the measure, argued themselves into a belief of the projected visit being nothing short of an imperative moral duty. When matters of an imperative moral duty. had gone thus far, a hint was dropped in the drawing-room, which immediately reached the 'domestic department,' and very soon spread through the village, - as the smallest stone falling into water creates successive circles around the spot where it fell, each increasing in circumference. Accordingly, the Flybekins were the centre of attraction on the following Sunday, after morning service. Hearty congratulations, and ardent wishes for a pleasant trip, with various commissions, pressed upon them. The newest fashions were promised to be brought down, and the village milliner looked forward to a glorious triumph over all her rivals in the trade about the country. The happy pair were on the pinnacle of provincial glory; he was expected to return with the true state of foreign affairs and the nation, of the past day, and the prospective engage-from the intercourse he would enjoy with the ments of the morrow. 'No, no; not till we see what the sure to which they looked forward there was but one drawback, viz. a most extraordinary dread of London fires at night; and this originated in the frequent occurrence in their county paper of paragraphs headed 'Another alarming conflagration; many lives lost!'-put in either to aid the insurance office, or fill the paper. As our rustic pair had never visited the metropolis, they did not know but Leadenhall Street and Hyde Park, Lambeth and Portland Place, might all be close neighbours; therefore, however distant the different fires might be, they fancied they all occurred nearly in the same place; and from the time Mr. and terror from their dreams, screaming 'Fire, fire!' All was hurry and preparation at 'the lodge,' until the anticipated arrival of the Barnstaple Sociable' one morning at the door, summoned the ambitious pair; and on the fourth day of their departure from Devonshire, they were duly set down at the White Horse was occupied in searching for, and entering, suitable lodgings; and the following day, having hired a carriage, which their unpractised eyes considered most elegant in style and relations before waiting on her grace. equipment, they sallied forth, armed with a cordingly thither they drove, accompanithe question of ' Lord and Lady B. at home?' to dinner. A card was then handed in, inscribed in the neatest spider-pattern handwriting of Mrs. Flybekin; and they drove off to pursue the agreeable pastime of shopping and going through part of the list of commissions, vivenda and agenda, with which they were provided. As the Flybekins drove along the streets, the words ' Patent Fire-escapes, in large letters, upon the front of a tall-house, attracted their attention, and roused all their latent fears of London fires, with accounts of which the newspapers so frequently teemed. A fire-escape would impart security to sleep, and might be taken down into the country. Accordingly the check-string was pulled, the manufactory entered, the machines inspected, an economical one selected by each: and in an hour after their arrival at home to dinner, the fire-escapes were duly mounted in one of the front bed-room windows. Their evening meal being finished at the barbarous hour of nine, the Flybekins began to yawn over the events repose at this early hour, and were both soon wrapt in deep sleep. Leaving them to enjoy their repose, we return to Grosvenor Square. The noble pair returned to a family dinner, and on entering the house, read, with strained eyeballs, the card deposited that morning by the Flybekins, and with some such an expression of countenance as one may be supposed to assume in discovering something in a drawer more than was anticipated. 'Umph!' said the peer, 'the Flybekins in town! what could have brought them up so far from the country?' 'Something that will not detain them long, I hope,' dryly answered Lady B. 'Yet we must take some notice of these coun-Mrs. Flybekins resolved to visit town, scarcely a night passed in which they did not start in them to a family dinner.' 'Well, if we must,' said the countess shrugging her shoulders; and with that the subject dropped for the time. Now it is quite clear, that however brilliant might have been the prospects of the Flybekins, the peer and his lady wished them any where but in London; and, rather than in-vite them to Grosvenor Square to dinner, the Cellar, for road-making had not then received former would have been glad to be let off with the magic touch of Macadam. The next day a writership for one of the sons in India. Their carriage was ordered at ten, to convey them to the Duchess of R.'s party, and Lord B. proposed to make a friendly call upon their cordingly thither they drove, accompanied by card-case, and a long list of commissions, the two footmen bearing blazing flambeaux, the practised horses going at the full rate of six custom of the great in those days, when the miles an hour. Arrived in Grosvenor Square, after siding along the when a long thundering rap at the door startled gutter close by the foot pavement, the distance of two or three houses, and with a little pre-bandy footman had gone home with the coach-bandy footman had gone home with the coachliminary tug of the reins, the coachman drew man and horses, the landlady and her family up opposite the door of No. —. Two powdered had followed the example of the lodgers; and lackeys in rich livery were peering through before any one could rise to unbar and open the long narrow windows on each side of the the door, to ascertain the cause of such an door, and anticipated the intention of the di- unusual alarm, a second louder and longer rap minutive, bandy footman, of knocking, (that had been made upon it, and which awoke the is, if he could have reached the knocker). To sleepers to an instinctive idea that the house was on fire; a notion confirmed by the strong a negative answer was delivered; they were glare of red light reflected against their wingone to the country, but were expected back dows, and illuminating the apartment, as the footmen impatiently shook thousands of sparks from the flambeaux. As Bonaparte observed upon another occasion, ' From the sublime to the ridiculous is but one step.' So it was with the Flylekins. From the most sublime repose they hurried into the ridiculous fire-escapes, in the full conviction that the lower part of the house was on fire; and without waiting to dress, or inquire into the real state of affairs, they gave the signal-word 'Now!' and both descended in all the freshness of their fears to the pavement before the door! The wondering lord and lady, and still more wondering footman, gazed upon the apparition before them with the most inexplicable amazement, totally at a loss to conceive the cause of such a novel reception. The terrified pair were, like Othello, 'perplexed in the extreme,' when they found themselves, instead of being in the confusion of a fire, deposited beneath the windows of a magnificent carriage, attended by footmen with white torches, and a full-dressed lady and gentleman inquiring after them, and the meaning of the extraordinary descent. peer; she was expected to import news of morning in the crowded London streets had few minutes served to explain the mal-à-propos operas, plays, music, novels, writers, balls, completely tired the rustic couple, who being mistake; the detected pair sought refuge in routs, drawing-rooms and dresses, from her susceptible of no farther excitement, sought the hall of the house, with some such feelings

The carriage rolled away with the tittering coachman and footmen, and the ill-suppressed mirth of their master and mistress, who quickly disseminated the story throughout the fashionable throng of the party whither they were bent, and which remained for the rest of the season a standing joke wherever Lord and Lady B. appeared. Humbled and confused, the unhappy Flybekins could not retrieve the blunder they had committed, and prudently re-signed all their ambitious schemes. So they returned to Devonshire with the unlucky fireescapes, sincerely regretting they had ever been tempted to purchase them. But, although the disaster had got wind, and with various ver-sions had reached even into Devonshire, they were much consoled by the following narration of it which appeared in the county paper, in a light most favourable to their interests and reputation, although totally devoid of truth in almost every particular. The flaming paragraph ran thus: — We understand that Mr. and Mrs. Flybekin, of —, in this county, while upon a visit to their noble relatives, Lord and Lady B. in London, narrowly escaped being burnt to death. The devouring element almost destroyed the lower part of the family mansion in Grosvenor Square, over which the lady and gentleman slept, who had retired early to bed, and who by the accidental return of Lord and Lady B. from a party, were awakened only just in time to effect their retreat by means of a fire-escape, fortunately attached to their bed-room window. We are informed that the fire occurred in consequence of the footmen appointed to sit up for their master and mistress having fallen asleep, leaving a lighted candle in the room. Mr. and Mrs. Flybekin escaped, with the loss of all their clothes but what they hurried on in the confusion, and were conveyed to a neighbouring hotel by their noble relatives, where they received succour for the night.' But unhappily for the Flybe-into Devonshire, and the true statement of the matter was circulated as above related, and now handed down to their posterity. Thus the best version of their story only placed them 'out of the fire into the frying-pan,' and the unlucky fire-escapes merely saved them from the fear of being badly burnt, in order that they might all the rest of their lives be well roasted!"

In the preface we find the following passage: "Where the writers have not affixed their names to the MSS., I have not taken the liberty of adding them, fearing it would be considered as a breach of confidence, by those who might not wish their names to be known. my noble contributors say they withhold their signatures in consequence of the severity with which aristocratic writers are treated by some of the critical press :- while acceding to their wishes, I must be allowed a difference of opinion on this point; and, indeed, the two contributions with which they have honoured the Comic Offering might, I think, fearlessly encounter all unprejudiced criticism.'

We fear there is some truth in this; but surely aristocratic writers ought rather to be satisfied with the praise of those whose talents raise them towards their rank, than regard the blackguardism which in vain endeavours to reduce them to its own level.

We shall now conclude with two or three specimens of the versification; the last being recommended by its nominal catalogue of our friends the publishers.

Country Houses. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Saunders and Otley.

A COLLECTION of light and lively tales, containing the many modes of matrimony which form the staple of a novel of modern life. Christmas is thus described by the hero:-" I wonder what people can mean by wishing one a merry Christmas, said Mr. Vernon, as he walked from the drawing-room window, where he had been watching the flakes of snow as they fell; 'I know nothing that Christmas brings but frost and snow, that puts an end to hunting; and long bills, one has no money to pay. For my part, I make it a rule never to open a letter from Christmas till February, he could caricature with his pencil as well as that I may not encounter a tender epistle from my tailor or boot-maker, with 'hard times,' 'a large family,' 'heavy payment to make next week,' when one has not a shilling in one's banker's hands: and the rascals are only making up a purse for Brighton, instead of coats or boots for their customers: and of all this misery, stupid souls wish you joy! Is it not so, ma'am?' addressing his mother, Lady Vernon, who was deeply engaged writing tickets for clothing for the poor."

The Easter Holydays get up private theatricals, with a little touch of sentiment; and the rest of the stories pursue " the changes of the rolling year." The following sketch of Mr. Fitzgibbon is a fair specimen of the author's style.

"Mr. Fitzgibbon's praise of Emma's performance was mixed, but very gently mixed, with criticism; but so judicious, and so very well seasoned with encouragement, she could not help feeling grateful for the approbation, and anxious to be more deserving of it. He seemed so like a friend-and he was not a young man. She was too inexperienced to know that a man of the world never considers himself old, or too old to be a lover-he knows how to make himself up: he may be called 'an old donkey' by the boys in the guards—but he has his experience, and his knowledge of the world; and as 'each thinks his little set, mankind,' this gives him great advantages. He had, though, no intention of becoming a lover of Emma'sindeed, he could afford to love nothing but a large fortune; and such an one had not come entirely within his reach: perhaps he did not wish to sit down a Benedict, even with a place, a park, and a wife. He had a moderate independent fortune, enough for a good lodging in town-a couple of backs for riding, a curricle, or a cabriolet, as might be the reigning fashion-he belonged to the best clubs; and for the rest, he 'lived about'-was asked to shooting-parties-ran down to Newmarket when any particular match was to be won -he had long given up Melton; 'he was,' he said, with a shrug, 'too poor,' and those to whom he said it were wont to add, 'and too old also;' but he was always acceptable in a country house, either with or without a large party-he was full of anecdote, trifling or literary; played a little on the violin-was some judge of pictures, and a good one of prints. He well knew how to make the most of himself, and increase the favour of his visit wherever he chose to bestow it, by

In selecting the cuts we have rather been led | well at billiards, chess, and whist, and was, in summer, a most determined and scientific fisherman-and adding to all these conventual qualifications, had popular and agreeable manners, and he every where made himself welcome-he also possessed a good dash of a sort of sarcastic wit, which made him a little feared, sufficiently so not to be considered always a convenient person, that might be treated haut en bas. It was that species which a century ago carried a man into the first society, but wit has died with the Horace Walpole race: perhaps his might, as it was employed, be better termed a taste for the ridiculous, and an aptitude to turn what he did not like into the laughable: it was very useful to him in keeping people a little in awe of him, and it also gave him the privilege of saying rather bitter, and sometimes rather impertinent, things with impunity; nobody minded him, because nobody liked to provoke his resentment by 'taking up his sallies.' There was a suspicion entertained that with his pen; but, if it was so, he had the good sense and tact to keep the talent either so concealed, or so controlled, he never gave offence by its exercise. He talked much of this lord or that distinguished character as his particular friend. It may be questioned if there was one amongst the catalogue that really deserved that name. Society, especially the higher grades of it, is maintained by the compact of mutual convenience, its liaisons are slender, brittle links, but they serve their purpose-mutual convenience and amusement; and even when the latter ceases to be afforded, the link may still continue, sometimes from habit, sometimes from fear; those who live much together in artificial life, however well the mask they wear may fit, it has often some crevice which betravs the real countenance; and those who live in the same set must of necessity be linked together by a little free-masonry.'

November's dull month being coming, these volumes may pass a pleasant hour in an empty country house; though the last two tales are perplexed, and far inferior to the earlier portions of the work.

> Taylor's Records of his Life. [Second Notice: conclusion.]

In our last No. we entered so sufficiently into the character and contents of this publication, that we have no occasion to go farther into remark, previous to making the few additional extracts with which we mean to conclude our notice; especially as the second volume, though full of biographical traits of persons well known to the last half century, is not so entertaining as the first, but seems to have been put together when years had stolen a deeper march upon the faculties of the writer. The consequences are, more of garrulousness and repetition, and less of anecdote and interest; but again we have to say that, with all defects, there is altogether much both of amusement and curious gossipping information in this posthumous work.

We commence with a bit of Macklin.

"He told me (says the writer) that his first performance of Shylock was in Lord Lans. down's alteration of Shakspeare's play, which was brought forward under the title of 'The Jew of Venice;' and that it was for his performance in this play that the following wellknown couplet was written upon him:

'This is the Jew That Shakspeare drew.'

to be seen there at the present time. As far as I can recollect, the following were his words: — Sir, you then saw no red cloaks, and heard no pattens in the pit; but you saw merchants from the city with big wigs, lawyers from the Temple with big wigs, and physicians from the coffee-houses with big wigs; and the whole exhibited such a formidable grizzle, as might well shake the nerves of actors and authors.' • • • The last time The last time I ever saw Macklin was in Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, during a very severe frost, when the snow had hardened on the ground. He was well muffled up in a great-coat, and walked to and fro with great vigour. I addressed him, and said, Well, Mr. Macklin, I suppose you are comparing the merits of former actors with those of the present day.'
The what of the present day? said he in a 'The what of the present day?' said he in a very loud tone; 'the what, sir?' in a louder tone; 'the actors, sir?' He repeated his question with a voice that made the whole street ring. 'Perhaps, sir,' said I, 'you will not allow the present race to be actors.' Good morning, sir,' said he, and abruptly parted from me, resuming his walk with extraordinary strength and speed."

Of the late Lord Erskine -

"Here I may relate a circumstance which manifests an extraordinary revolution in the life of a conspicuous character. A lieutenant in the royal navy had written a political pamphlet, but being called to his duty, was not able to see it through the press. He therefore placed it in the hands of a bookseller, desiring that he would give it to some literary man, who, for duly preparing it for publication, should have half the profits. The bookseller gave it Mr. Cooke, who soon discharged his duty. The work was published, and the profits were thirty pounds, all of which was given to Mr. Cooke, who took his portion, and reserved the other half for the author whenever he should call for it. Many years elapsed and he beard nothing of him. At length a gentleman called on him, told his name, and declared himself to be the author of the pamphlet, telling him he knew that fifteen pounds were due to him on account of the pamphlet, and adding, he was ashamed to take it, but that ' his poverty and not his will' consented, as he had a wife and an increasing family. Mr. Cooke had the money ready for him, which the stranger took, and expressed his gratitude at parting. This necessitous author was the late Lord Erskine."

While speaking of a performer in Garrick's time known by the respectable name of King Gibson, we are told a story of a tipple which would hardly recommend itself as a strong drink even to a weak head.

"The inferior actors at that period were careless and dissipated, and as soon as the business of the night was over, they generally spent the remainder of it at low public-houses which were much frequented in consequence o their being the resort of the theatrical fra ternity. A young man who had recently beer engaged at Covent Garden Theatre, had comfrom some provincial company, and was hardly known to any of the London actors, conducted himself with such modest diffidence, that he attracted the notice of the veteran Gibson, who one day after rehearsal took him aside, and addressed him to the following purpose:-Young man, I have observed your modes demeanour, and I see with some satisfaction that you are not intimate with the actors; le always having various engagements to choose He said the pit was at that period generally me advise you, as an old man well acquainted out of besides being a good shot, he played attended by a more select audience than were with life, to avoid public-houses. Yet, if he had taken due care of his he grew impatient, and asked me if he might health, and prudently managed his fortune, he go himself to the quarter in question. I an-might still be alive and an ornament to the great epoch in human nature.

" Dr. Monsey told me that he was once in company with another physician and an eminent farrier. The physician stated, that among the difficulties of his profession was that of disyear, and that I had spoken of his talents in covering the maladies of children, as they could which it was founded, that I jocularly said to the highest terms, and of the advantages which not explain the symptoms of their disorders. Well,' said the farrier, 'your difficulties are not greater than mine, for my patients, the horses, are equally unable to explain their complaints.' 'Ah!' rejoined the physician, 'my 'Ah!' rejoined the physician, 'my brother doctor must conquer me, as he has brought his cavalry against my infantry.' Of Foote.

" Foote's manner of relating a humorous story, with his powers of mimicry, must doubtless have been very entertaining to those who were not too refined for fun, or too delicate for buffoonery. Mr. Murphy used to relate the following story of Foote's, the heroines of which were the Ladies Cheere, Fielding, and Hill, the last the widow of the celebrated Dr. Hill. He represented them as playing at 'I love my love with a letter;' Lady Cheere began, and said, 'I love my love with an N, because he is a Night;' Lady Fielding followed with 'I love my love with a G, because he is a Gustis;' and 'I love my love with an F,' said Lady Hill, 'because he is a Fizishun.' Such was the imputed orthography of these learned ladies."

We have already noticed the imperfections which may be discerned in these Records; and it is but fair towards the memory of their author to quote what he himself says concerning

"The present work has been written in a desultory manner, with several intervals, occasioned by illness, which, at one time was of so alarming a description that my friend Mr. Cooke, and another eminent surgeon, thought it hardly "As a proof that he was a kind and consi. possible that I should recover. I might easily have extended it, but was tired of the task, and was urged to conclude it by my friends, who cherished such hopes of its success as I fear will be disappointed. I am now at a very advanced age, and though I have no reason to believe that my mind has decayed as well as my corporeal strength, yet I cannot help agreeing with the opinion of David Hume, who says, ' I consider that a man at sixty-five, by dying, cuts off only a few years of infirmities; and if it had been my fate to leave the world at that period of my life, I should not only have escaped infirmities, but disappointments, vexations, and sorrows. To borrow the words of Dr. Johnson, in the last paper of his admirable Rambler, that the same sentiments have not sometimes recurred, or the same expressions been too frequently repeated, I have not confidence in my abilities sufficient to warrant.' And, indeed, such must inevitably be the case; for I am not to coin words, and if I am describing tempers, qualities, talents, and persons of a similar nature, I must, of course, make use of similar epithets and forms of expression."

And here we conclude. One of the most curious features in the author's life seems to have been the number of funerals which he attended, and the number of prologues he wrote: what with stories of the parties distinguished by his observance of their obsequies, and of those connected with his theatrical pursuits, his book is full of chit-chat, very pleasant to pass a vacant hour, and as such we again recommend it to the reader.

The Works of Lord Byron. Vol. X. Murray. [Second notice: conclusion.]

Not having room for all we wished to say of and extract from this volume in our last notice. we now, sans phrase, return to Lara. have always differed from those who considered it a continuation of the Corsair. There is nothing in the first poem that can for a moment allow us to suppose that Conrad has a home and station which he need only seek, to be, as he has every reason to suppose, in a state of honour and security. The lines which run

". Doomed by his very virtues for a duke, Nor deemed that gifts bestowed on better men Had left him joy and means to give again"— imply wasted patrimony, which could not be the case with the "long self-exiled chieftain." Again, the character of Lara is drawn in much darker shades than that of Conrad. Conrad, " Feared, shunned, belied, ere youth had lost her force," His faults are the result of thoughtlessnessthen of circumstance; but in Lara they appear to have arisen from experiment, and the desire of excitement -

"Woman, the field, the ocean, all that gave Promise of gladness—peril of a grave, In turn he tried."

There is a selfishness about the last that did not belong to the first. Between Gulnare and Its irregularity, when moulded under the Kaled there is more resemblance: both are passionate, devoted, and eastern; but certainly the most careful reader would fail to find in than was admitted in some of the most delithe one poem a single line that connects it with the other. We proceed with our extracts.

" Hebrew Melodies .- Lord Byron never alludes to his share in these Melodies with complacency. Mr. Moore having, on one occasion, rallied him a little on the manner in which some of them had been set to music,-Sunburn Nathan!' he exclaims, 'why do you always twit me with his Ebrew nasalities? Have I not told you it was all Kinnaird's doing, and my own exquisite facility of temper?'

" 'She walks in beauty.' - These stanzas were written by Lord Byron on returning from a ball-room, where he had seen Mrs. (now Lady) Wilmot Horton, the wife of his relation, the present governor of Ceylon. On this oc-casion, Mrs. W. H. had appeared in mourning, with numerous spangles on her dress.

Byron's own remarks:

"With regard to the observations on carelessness,' &c. wrote Lord Byron to a friend, 'I think, with all humility, that the gentle reader has considered a rather uncommon, and decidedly irregular, versification for haste and negligence. The measure is not that of any of the other poems, which (I believe) were allowed to be tolerably correct, according to Bysshe and the fingers - or ears - by which bards write, and readers reckon. Great part of the 'Siege' is in (I think) what the learned call anapests, (though I am not sure, being heinously forgetful of my metres and my Gradus,) and many of the lines intentionally longer or shorter than its rhyming companion; and the rhyme also occurring at greater or less intervals of caprice or convenience. I mean not to say that this is right or good, but merely that I could have been smoother, had it appeared to me of advantage; and that I was not otherwise without being aware of the deviation, though I now feel sorry for it, as I would undoubtedly rather please than not. My wish has been to try at something different from my former efforts; as I endeavoured to make them differ from each other. The versification of the 'Corsair' is not that of 'Lara,' nor the 'Giaour' that of the 'Bride: 'Childe Harold' is, again, varied from these; and I strove to vary the last somewhat from all of the others. Excuse all this nonsense and egotism. The fact is, that I am rather trying to think on the subject of this note, than really thinking on it.'

"On Christmas-day, 1815, Lord Byron, enclosing this fragment to Mr. Murray, says-I send some lines, written some time ago, and intended as an opening to the 'Siege of Corinth.' I had forgotten them, and am not sure that they had not better be left out now;—on that, you and your synod can determine. 'They are written,' says Moore, in the loosest form of that rambling style of metre which his admiration of Mr. Coleridge's 'Christabel' led him at this time to adopt.' It will be seen, hereafter, that the poet had never read 'Christabel' at the time when he wrote these lines;—he had, however, the 'Lay of the Last Minstrel.' With regard to the character of the species of versification at this time so much in favour, it may be observed, that feeble imitations have since then vulgarised it a good deal to the general ear; but that in the hands of Mr. Coleridge, Sir Walter Scott, and Lord Byron himself, it has often been employed with the most happy effect. guidance of a delicate taste, is more to the eye than to the ear, and in fact not greater cious of the lyrical measures of the ancient Greeks.

"In one of his sea excursions, Lord Byron was nearly lost in a Turkish ship of war, owing to the ignorance of the captain and crew. 'Fletcher,' he says, 'yelled; the Greeks called on all the saints; the Mussulmans on Alla; while the captain burst into tears, and ran below deck. I did what I could to console Fletcher; but finding him incorrigible, I wrapped myself up in my Albanian capote, and lay down to wait the worst.'

This striking instance of the poet's coolness and courage is thus confirmed by Mr. Hobhouse: 'Finding that, from his lameness, he was unable to be of any service in the exertions which our very serious danger called for, after a laugh or two at the panic of his valet, he not only wrapped himself up and lay down, in the manner he has described, but when our difficulties were terminated was found fast asleep."

Gifford was allowed great license in correcting the 'Siege of Corinth;' and, as usual in such cases, his alterations did not coincide with the spirit of the poet. It is curious to observe how different the public feeling, and how often it would refuse to confirm the critical opinion.

"The 'Siege of Corinth,' which appears, by the original MS. to have been begun in July 1815, made its appearance in January 1816. Mr. Murray having enclosed Lord Byron a thousand guineas for the copyright of this poem and of 'Parisina,' he replied,— Your offer is liberal in the extreme, and much more than the two poems can possibly be worth: but I cannot accept it, nor will not. You are most welcome to them as additions to the collected volumes; but I cannot consent to their separate publication. I do not like to risk any fame (whether merited or not) which I have been favoured with upon compositions which I do not feel to be at all equal to my own notions of what they should be; though they may do very well as things without pretension, to add to the publication with the lighter pieces. I have enclosed your draft torn, for fear of accident by the way -I wish you would not throw temptation in mine. It is not from a disdain of the universal idol, nor from a present superfluity of his treasures, can assure you, that I refuse to worship him; but what is right is right, and must not yield to circumstances. I am very glad that the handwriting was a favourable omen of the morale of the piece; but you must not trust to that; for my copyist would write out any thing I desired, in all the ignorance of innocence - I hope, however, in this instance, with no great peril to either.' The copyist was Lady Byron. Lord Byron gave Mr. Gifford carte-blanche to strike out or alter any thing at his pleasure in this poem, as it was passing through the press; and the reader will be amused with the variæ lectiones which had their origin in this extraordinary confidence. Mr. Gifford drew his pen, it will be seen, through at least one of the most admired passages."

We subjoin a few of the intended altera-

"But when all is past, it is humbling to tread
O'er the weltering field of the tombless dead.
And see worms of the earth, and fowls of the air,
Beasts of the forest, all gathering there;
All regarding man as their prey,
All rejoicing in his decay.

There is a temple in run stands,
Fashion'd by long-forgotten hands;
Two or three columns, and many a stone,
Marble and granite, with grass o'ergrown;
Out upon time! it will leave no more
Of the things to come than the things before!
Out upon time! who for ever will leave
But enough of the past for the future to grieve O'er that which has been, and o'er that which must be:

be:
What we have seen, our sons shall see;
Remnants of things that have passed away,
Fragments of stone, rear'd by creatures of clay! §

O'er the weltering limbs of the tombless dead. -Gifford.
† MS.—" All that liveth on man will prey,

All rejoice in his decay, All that can kindle dismay and disgust Follow his frame from the bier to the dust."

Omit this couplet.—Gifford. After this follows in MS.—

We like much the note from Coleridge. Speaking of the description of Parisina:

"A sagacious writer gravely charges Lord Byron with paraphrasing, in this passage, without acknowledgment, Mr. Burke's wellknown description of the unfortunate Marie Antoinette. 'Verily,' says Mr. Coleridge, 'there be amongst us a set of critics, who seem to hold, that every possible thought and image is traditional; who have no notion that there are such things as fountains in the world, small as well as great; and who would there-fore charitably derive every rill they behold flowing, from a perforation made in some other man's tank."

It were injustice to omit the noble passage of Lockhart's relative to the publication of those pieces which directly allude to Byron's private feelings.

"Lord Byron had at least this much to say for himself, that he was not the first to make his domestic differences a topic of public discussion. On the contrary, he saw himself ere any fact but the one undisguised and tangible one was, or could be known, held up every where, and by every art of malice, as the most infamous of men,-because he had parted from his wife. He was exquisitely sensitive: he was wounded at once by a thousand arrows; and all this with the most perfect and indignant knowledge, that of all who were assailing him, not one knew any thing of the real merits of the case. Did he right, then, in publishing those squibs and tirades? No, certainly: it would have been nobler, better, wiser far, to have utterly scorned the assaults of such enemies, and taken no notice, of any kind, of them. But, because this young, hot-blooded, proud, patrician poet did not, amidst the exacerbation of feelings which he could not control, act in precisely the most dignified and wisest of all possible manners of action, - are we entitled, is the world at large entitled, to issue a broad sentence of vituperative condemnation? Do we know all that he had suffered?—have we imagination enough to comprehend what he suffered, under circumstances such as these? - have we been tried in similar circumstances, whether we could feel the wound unflinchingly, and keep the weapon quiescent, in the hand that trembled with all the excitements of insulted privacy, honour, and faith? Let people consider for a moment what it is that they demand when they insist upon a poet of Byron's class abstaining altogether from expressing in his works any thing of his own feelings in regard to any thing that immediately concerns his own history. We tell him in every possible form and shape, that the great and distinguishing merit of his poetry is the intense truth with which that poetry ex-presses his own personal feelings. We encourage him in every possible way to dissect his own heart for our entertainment - we tempt him by every bribe most likely to act powerfully on a young and imaginative man, to plunge into the darkest depths of self-knowledge; to madden his brain with eternal self-scrutinies, to find his pride and his pleasure in what others shrink from as torture - we tempt him to indulge in these dangerous exercises, until they obviously acquire the power of leading him to the very brink of frenzy - we tempt him to find, and to see in this perilous vocation, the staple of his existence, the food of his ambition, the very essence of his glory,-and the moment that, by habits of our own creating, at least of our own encouraging and confirming, he is carried one single step beyond what we happen to approve of, we turn round with all the bitterness of spleen, and reproach him with the unmanliness of entertaining the public with his feelings in regard to his separation from his wife. This was truly the conduct of a fair and liberal public! To our view of the matter, Lord Byron, treated as he had been, tempted as he had been, and tortured and insulted as he was at the moment, did no more forfeit his character by writing what he did write upon that unhappy occasion, than another man, under circumstances of the same nature, would have done, by telling something of his mind about it to an intimate friend across the fire. The public had forced him into the habits of familiarity, and they received his confidence with nothing but anger and scorn."

"On the sheet containing the original draught of these lines ('Churchill's grave'), Lord Byron has written: 'The following poem (as most that I have endeavoured to write) is founded on a fact; and this detail is an attempt at a serious imitation of the style of a great poet, its beauties and its defects: I say the style, for the thoughts I claim as my own. In this, if there be any thing ridiculous, let it be attributed to me, at least as much as to Mr. Wordsworth; of whom there can exist few greater admirers than myself. I have blended what I would deem to be the beauties as well as defects of his style; and it ought to be remembered, that in such things, whether there be praise or dis-praise, there is always what is called a compliment, however unintentional."

It is a common-place canon, that Lord Byron's whole inspiration was personal: this is true generally; but there are some splendid exceptions. Witness, in this very volume, the touching pathos of the 'Prisoner of Chillon,' and the magnificent Martin-like picture of 'Darkness;' neither of which had the least reference to his own feelings.

Standard Novels. Nos. XIX. and XX. The Pastor's Fireside. By Jane Porter. Lionel Lincoln. By the Author of the "Spy." London, 1832. Bentley.

THESE last volumes of this singularly neat and cheap edition are embellished by Pickering, and a vignette by Adams,—the last very spi-Lionel Lincoln has a preface, by Cooper, rited. in which he mentions a curious fact, that the frequent introduction of the moon in his story had met with critical objection; it was, nevertheless, founded on fact, as he had obtained a diary of the weather at that actual period, to which he rigidly adhered. He also goes into some particulars relative to the characters; and we find the following judicious remarks on America as a field of literature, and also an interesting reference to the author's account of Bunker's Hill.

" Perhaps there is no other country whose history is so little adapted to poetical illustration as that of the United States of America. The art of printing has been in general use since the earliest settlement, and the policy of both the provinces and the States has been to encourage the dissemination of accurate know-ledge. There is consequently neither a dark, nor even an obscure, period in the American annals; all is not only known, but so well and generally known, that nothing is left for the imagination to embellish. It is true that the world has fallen into its usual errors on the subject of individual character; taking those situation when in Dally's hands, is very graparts which are the most conspicuous and the best understood, as guides in establishing a harmony that it almost always insists on; while he who thoroughly understands human nature is not to learn that the most opposite qualities are frequently the inhabitants of the same breast. But it is the part of the poet to humour these mistakes; for there is no blunder more sure to be visited by punishment than that which tempts a writer to instruct his readers when they wish only to be amused. The author has had these truths forced upon him by experience, and in no instance more obviously than in the difficulties he encountered in writing this his only historical tale, and in its reception by the world. That he has not disregarded the opinion of the latter, is proved by his having discontinued attempts of whose uselessness he has been so clearly, though so delicately admonished. Notwithstanding the unequivocal admission, that Lionel Lincoln is not what its author hoped it would have been, when he commenced his task, he still thinks it is not without some claim to the reader's attention. The battles of Lexington and Bunker's Hill, and the movement on Prospect Hill, are believed to be as faithfully described as is possible to have been done by one who was not an eye-witness of those important events. pains were spared in examining all the documents, both English and American; and many private authorities were consulted, with a strong desire to ascertain the truth. The ground was visited and examined, and the differing testi-mony was subjected to a close comparison between the statements and the probability. Even a journal of the state of the weather was procured, and its entries were rigidly respected; so that he who feels sufficient interest in these details may rest assured that he will obtain facts on all these particulars by reading this A liberal, book. and certainly a favourable, criticism of this book, considering its demerits, contained a remark, that the conception and delineation of the characters of the idiot and the madman must have given great trouble to its author. It may be well, therefore, to add, that both Job Pray and Ralph were drawn from life, and with as rigid an adherence even to language as the course of the narrative would allow."

Vortigern; an Historical Play. With an Ori-ginal Preface. By W. H. Ireland. London, 1832. Thomas.

WE hardly think it possible to revive the interest once excited by this spurious play, and, in our opinion, unimposing forgery; though, like most bold impositions, it found advocates and defenders in its day, even such as Parr, Warton, Chalmers, and other eminent persons. Now it must strike every sensible reader as a poor imitation of parts of Hamlet, Macbeth, and Richard III., - neither skilfully put together nor adequately disguised. As a literary curiosity, and a youthful trick, perhaps too severely punished by the future misfortunes of the author, it, however, claims a place on the book-shelf.

The Refugee in America. By Frances Trollope. 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Whittaker and Co.

As a whole, these volumes, which we have now seen complete, do not sustain the liveliness of parts. Many of the sketches of American manners are repetitions of Mrs. Trollope's former work; the story is wire-drawn, and at last improbable; and the horror of Lord Darcy's

[&]quot;Monuments that the coming age Leaves to the spoil of the seasons' rage— Till ruln makes the relics scarce, Then learning acts her solemn farce, And, roaming through the marble waste, Prates of beauty, art, and taste."

prehension of the tone of exaggeration and ill nature taken by the writer on all Transatlantic subjects; and there is nothing in this work to call for further remark.

The Family Library, No. XXXV.: Peter the Great. London, 1832. Murray.

An extremely well compiled life of one of the most remarkable men that ever lived; drawn from the best authorities, and affording an interesting picture of his extraordinary career.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

M. Ruppell.—A letter from M. Durheim to the French Academy (read at the sitting of the 8th October) gave some account of M. Ruppell, who, in 1830, set out on the second tour in Africa, which he is now performing. He first travelled through the whole of Arabia, wishing to determine the positions of the principal places. He crossed the Red Sea at Mocha, intending to pass through the south part of Abyssinia, and thence to cross the Moun-tains of the Moon, into the centre of the African continent: but revolution having broken out in Arabia, Abyssinia, and the country of the Gallas, who inhabit the plains near the Mountains of the Moon, M. Ruppell was obliged to stop on the isle of Massuah, where he waited for the end of the civil wars. Meantime he explored the parts of Abyssinia nearest to the coast, and sent the descriptions of several animals but little known. Among them is that of a large species of antelope, as tall as a stag, which he takes to be the true orix of the ancients, and which is called in Abyssinia beisa. He has also discovered a new species of dugos, which inhabits the Red Sea, and differs much from the only known species which is found in the Indian Sea. It was with the skin of this species of the Red Sea that the ancient Israelites were obliged, by the law of Moses, to cover the tabernacle; and M. Ruppell has given it the name of halicore tabernaculi. The traveller has also discovered the ruins of the ancient Adulis, the geographical position of which town was not previously known.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Anatomical Demonstrations, or Colossal Illus trations of Human Anatomy. By Professor Seerig. Part II. London, 1832. Schloss. THIS fasciculus contains five plates of the brain, several times larger than in the living subject, with an accompanying letter-press reference to the various parts. It is an admirable aid to the anatomical student, though there is some difficulty in consequence of several of the nerves not following the classification adopted in the English school. Nothing, however, can exceed the fidelity with which the various parts are represented (with, perhaps, the exception of No. VI., the base of the cranium and egress of the cerebral nerves, which seems to us to be a little artificial); and either in conjunction with actual dissection, or as a remembrancer afterwards, we can conceive nothing more eligible for the young surgeon than these plates.

PINE ARTS.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Landscape Annual for 1833. Jennings and Chaplin.

WE have now before us the large paper copy of this work, and can only reiterate our praise of its beauty, as witnessed on this magnified scale. It is indeed a superb performance, and

We have before expressed our re- | highly honourable to our fine arts, whether we consider Mr. Harding, the draughtsman, or his engravers.

> Roses, &c. By L. Stoll. London, A. Schloss. A LITHOGRAPHIC group of flowers, coloured after nature by an Austrian artist, whose talents in the representation of botanical subjects appear to be of a high order. This is sweetly executed, and fit as the rich productions of Flora herself for "my lady's chamber."

> Illustrations of the Literary Souvenir. 1833. TEN charming embellishments; and not only charming in themselves, but well selected with reference to variety and contrast. Our favourites are :

The Prince of Spain's Visit to Catalina. Engraved by C. Rolls, from a painting by G. S. Newton, R.A. Richly composed, and full of expression .- Children in prayer. Engraved by S. Sangster from a painting by T. Uwins. We have seldom seen youthful piety more sweetly depicted.—The Chevalier Bayard conferring Knighthood on Francis I. Engraved by W. Greatbach, from a painting by Fragonard. A gorgeous assemblage of objects; the effect a little theatrical, but perhaps that is inseparable from the subject.—Fairies danoing on the Sea-shore. Engraved by W. Millar, from a design by W. Danby, R.A. Exquisite: the eye is absolutely dazzled in gazing upon it. - A Campoise Girl. Engraved by C. Fox, From a painting by G. S. Newton, R.A. Mr. Fox has evidently been emulous of Mr. Doo's engraving of Newton's "Dutch Girl;" and if his finely executed plate had been of the same size, it would have been a worthy companion of that admirable production. - Heidelberg Castle. Engraved by J. Willmore, from a design by D. Roberts. This magnificent and venerable structure makes a great figure among the new Annuals. Mr. Roberts's representation of it is fully equal to that of any of its contemporaries.

Illustrations of the New Year's Gift and Juvenile Souvenir, 1833.

IF the sole embellishment of the New Year's Gift were "The Invalid Mother," engraved by P. Lightfoot, from a picture by A. Scheffer, so beautiful and affecting a composition would render it a valuable present to the young and renear it a valuable present to the young and feeling. But it boasts (besides a lively title-page) of seven other pleasing and clever plates; viz. "Sisters," engraved by S. Sangster from a picture by A. Johannot; the "Mother of Procida," engraved by W. Greatbach from a picture by A. Colin; the "Little Mendicant," organization by W. Greatbach from a picture by W. Greatbach from a picture by W. Greatbach from a picture by W. engraved by W. Greatbach, from a picture by R. Westall, R.A.; "French Village School," engraved by W. Greatbach, from a picture by Decamps; the "Introduction of Raphael to the Duchess of Urbino," engraved by J. Outrim, from a picture by Eugene Deveria; the "No-vice," engraved by T. S. Engleheart, from a picture by Sasoferrata; and the "Kitten's Mishap," engraved by W. Greatbach, from a picture by H. Howard, R.A.

POETRY.

WE intend, this week, deviating from our general rule, and giving these columns to a few of the Annuals reviewed last week.

FROM THE KEEPSAKE. To the Rhine. By Lord Mahon. When last I saw thy gushing flood Roll on its course in conscious pride,
My friend—the first and dearest—stood
In health and gladness by my side.

Who then that watched his soul-lit eye, His buoyant step, his joyous tone, Would dream that dread mortality Already marked him for her own? Already marked him for her own!
Close to thy verdant side we sat,
Where Eglisau in beauty shines,
Upon a grassy mound like that
Which now his mouldering frame enshrines!
We spoke of love, and flowers, and spring,
And hopes to brighten future years,
Nor thought a few short months would bring Him to the tomb and me to tears. Him to the tomb and me to tests.

I see unchanged thy cliffs, thy bowers,
Those clustering vines, that whits-walled town,
And, high above, those feudal towers
In ruined majesty look down;
I see thy waters foam and flow,
And feel my youthful hopes must prove
Fast fleeting, like the floods below,
Worn like the battlements above. worn like the battlements above.

Dear river, I have loved thee well,
But now as o'er thy banks I bend,
Thy eddying waters seem to tell
The death-dirge of my earliest friend;
To me no more thy sound shall be
A sound of joy, thou lovely Rhine!
But in my darkening memory
My L—v—n's name shall blend with thine!

It is Madame de Staël who observes that the words "no more" are the most touching in our language, while the charm of their melancholy music is quite indefinable.

No more. By Lady Emmeline Stuart Wortley. No more-oh, it must be no more! That precious dreaming o'er that precious love!
Must, then, that mighty happiness be o'er,
And must my heart wail like a wounded dove?
No more—oh, it must be no more!

Ne'er shall I know its kindling might again,
That heart-burst of young passion in its power;
But faintly droop as flowers beneath the rain,
And die in dreams of that last meeting-hour!
No more—oh, it must be no more!

And spring is here bewilderingly bright;
A laughing world of sunshine and of rose
Greets every where the heart, and thought, and sight;
But all in vain—they bring me no repose.
No more—oh, it must be no more!

Oh, the unburied dreams that haunt my mind, Spring, with thy scent-charged flowers do thou enchain!
or let me mourn heart-wasted, unresigned,
What mourning never can bring back again.
No more—oh, it must be no more!

But perished now for evermore and past
That costly consciousness of answered love,
Let my heart tremble into rest at last,
And wear the chains it unsuspecting wove.
No more—oh, it must be no more!

FROM THE FORGET ME NOT.

The Goodwives of Weinsberg. By Mary Howitt. Who can tell me where Weinsberg lies? As brave a town as any;
It must have cradled good and wise,
Both wives and maidens many.
Should I eer wooing have to do,
I faith, in Weinsberg will I woo! The Emperor Conrad, on a time, In wrath the town was battering, And near it lay his warriors prime, And sturdy horsemen clattering; And, with fierce firing, rode and ran All round about it horse and man. As him the little town withstood, As nim the little town wintstood,
Though every thing it wanted,
So did he swear in vengeful mood
No mercy should be granted;
And thus his heralds spake.—" This know,
I'll hang you, rascals, in a row!" When in the town was heard this threat,
It caused a great dejection,
And every neighbour neighbour met
With mournful interjection: Though bread was very dear in price, Yet dearer still was good advice. "Ah wo for me, most wretched man! Great wo the siege has won us!"
They cried, and overy priest began
"The Lord have mercy on us!"
"Oh, wo, wo, wo!" on all sides clanged;
"We feel e'en now as good as hanged!" When in despair wise men will sit, In spite of council-masters How oft has saved them woman's wit From manifold disasters! Since woman's wit, as all men know, Is subtler than aught else below. There was a wife to her goed man
But yesterday united,
And she a wise scheme hit upon,
Which the whole town delighted,
And made them all so full of gies,
They laughed and chattered famously.

Then, at the hour of midnight damp, Then, at the hour of midnight damp, Of wives a deputation Went out to the besiegers' camp, Praying for capitulation: So soft they prayed, so sweet they prayed! And for these terms their prayer was made

"That all the wives might be allowed
Their jewels forth to carry;
What else remained the warriors proud Might rive, and hang, and harry."
To this the emperor swore consent,
And back the deputation went.

Thereon, as soon as morn was spied,
What happened? Give good hear
The nearest gate was opened wide,
And out each wife came, bearing—
True as I live!—all pick-a-pack,
Her worthy husband in a sack!

Then many a courtier, in great wrath,
The goodwives would have routed;
But Conrad spake: "My kingly faith
May not be false or doubted!
Ha! bravo!" cried he, as they came;
"Think you our wives would do the same?"

Then gave he pardon and a feast. Then gave he parton and a reast,
Those gentle ones to pleasure;
And music all their joy increased,
And dancing without measure;
As did the mayoress walting twirl,
So did the besom-binding girl.

Ay, tell me now where Weinsberg lies, As brave a town as any,
And cradled has it good and wise
Both wives and maidens many:
If wooing e'er I have to do,
'Faith! one of Weinsberg will I woo!

FROM THE FRIENDSHIP'S OFFERING.

The Miniature. By R. F. Williams.

Time hurries on. Like the fleet courser in his arrowy flight;
Thus have the swift and joyful moments gone
In rapturous delight;

While I have cast
O'er my full heart a dream of bygone hours—
Visions of bliss that fing around the past
Their sunshine and their flowers.

Yes! once again
From those dear lips doth memory bear to me
Words whose sweet muste falls like summer-rain,
All joyously and free.

Winds waft around Sighs softly murmured—whispers faint and low; While the fresh air is rich with every sound That loving voices know.

Still are my eyes
Full of the scenes where thou wert fond and kind;
The fields, the flowers, the streams, the very skies
Are pictured on my mind,

Making still mine
Smiles rich in gladness as an autumn sky,
Thoughts breathing wisdom full of truths divine,
And meanings pure and high;

Bliss born of youth, Shedding a beauty on life's golden years, Stirring its hidden springs of love and truth, With feelings nursed in tears;

Joys that impart
Deep in the mind a knowledge fair and good,
Gladdening the breast, and feeding the young heart
With wild, delicious food;

Giving the breath
Language too kind for thoughts of worldly strife,
Filled with an influence as strong as death,
And deep as human life.

How sweetly blest
Musing I sit, entranced in visions rare,
While on my brain undying memories rest,
And leave a gladness there!

Thus as I gaze,
Fancy keeps weaving shadows fresh and bright;
Thus, too, the blissful dreams of other days
Come crowding on my sight.

What fairy spell,
Borne on the breath of the soft atmosphe
Hither has brought me all I love so well,
And all I hold so dear?

Charm is there none Save what is sealed within the enamoured breast; Memory awakens all the past has done, And Love performs the rest.

He 'tis who flings O'er our dull lives such deep and priceless worth; He 'tis who holds beneath his radiant wings Our Eden upon earth.

Brightest of themes!
Mine is the joyousness your spells impart—
Mine are your blissful thoughts and witching dres

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

THE DRAMA.

Minutes of Evidence taken before the Select Committee, &c. &c.

As our analysis of this evidence, if we may judge from the use made of it by our contemporaries, previous to any copies of it having got abroad, seems to have excited considerable public interest, we are more confirmed in our original purpose of going through the minutes, and enabling Monsieur Public to employ what are called his tongues (each speaking a different language) upon this as upon every other subject.

In our first paper we quoted Mr. Colman's opinions about angels and the naming of their stage, in applying them to women; but we are glad to see that during his (the examiner's) absence at Boulogne, Mr. Collier, who transacted his business, and did his duties for him, entertained opposite notions on the angelic controversy. Ex. gr. a question or two put to

"In the exercise of your duty as examiner of plays, suppose the word 'angel' was applied to a woman on the stage, should you erase it or not? Certainly not, speaking for myself, if it were not applied profanely: if a man in love were to call his mistress 'my angel,' I should think it no profanation; I should think it an ordinary expression of speech. — 'Gracious heaven!' for instance? I should not object to that. I should object to the unnecessary introduction of the name of the Creator on any occasion; but at the same time I should take this distinction, that expressions of this kind are to be allowed in tragedy, which is a serious representation, which in a comedy are not to be allowed. For instance, we see in Lear the old king kneel and imprecate a curse even on his child. In a comedy any thing of attended, there will be a number of personal the kind would be very revolting. The situation it disposed to frequent houses of ill-fame. the kind would be very revolting. The situa-tion could not occur, but if it could it would be offensive, inasmuch as it would not be at all consistent with the rest of the performance.

In our opinion Mr. Collier cuts quite close enough; but it is the invariable consequence, when a fuss is made about the merest trifle, by becoming a theme of discussion it becomes a thing of importance, and even strong minds cense; that he finds Shakespeare's plays attract are betrayed into the folly of being grave in as they are performed at the minors (thus condiscussing it. But Mr. Collier's testimony is full of good sense on all points: starring, for instance "With respect to the star system that has been adopted by the two great theatres, do you not think that it has been exceedingly hostile to dramatic literature, especially to any new plays? Certainly, inasmuch as it induces authors to write plays for particular actors, instead of composing them for a whole company capable of representing them; inasmuch, too, as it induces managers of theatres to neglect all the inferior parts of plays, and to rely entirely on one performer: when I call them inferior parts of plays, I call them so in reference to the hero and principal characters, not that they do not require considerable talents to act them properly."

With regard to this gentleman's opinion, that crime begets crime, it is obvious that wherever they have a speculative mart and field they will be encouraged by the opportunity and contagion; but beyond this, and this is little, the opprobium is not justly incurred. Theatres, like all other public occasions, congregate into an observable mass the profligate characters of the day; but it does not (beyond our foregoing exception) create them. The following are Mr. Collier's answers, &c. on this point :

" As you say a greater degree of immorality always exists in the neighbourhood of theatres, would it not be increased by an increased number of theatres? I think perhaps it might in the immediate neighbourhoods, but they would be smaller, and more divided; the theatres would not be so large, and the persons attracted there would not be so numerous._ Then the immorality depends on the area of the theatre? I think it will depend on the number of persons the theatre contains. If it contain 1000 persons, there will not be so large a bad neighbourhood round it as if it contains 4000 persons. - Is there any thing of that nature perceivable round the two large houses? I think it exists in a degree, and it is a very ancient complaint against theatres, that they collect a bad neighbourhood round them.—You think that the character of the neighbourhood of those two theatres is to be attributed to its vicinity to the theatres? a considerable degree. I am of opinion, that the number of houses of ill-fame in the neighbourhood is much owing to the number of women of the town who frequent the theatres. -Have you no means of judging whether the houses of ill-fame in the neighbourhood of the two great theatres bear a proportion to the number round the small theatres? I have no sufficient means of judging; but my opinion is that it is in proportion. I beg to state again, that I consider it in proportion to the size of the theatres; and that the quantity of immorality in the neighbourhood will depend on the attraction of the theatre. If a theatre is well attended, there will be a number of persons in

And this bears us out in our position. theatres collect the vicious together, but it is not the theatres which make them vicious; and they would equally exist over the area of the metropolis were there no theatres at all.

Mr. Davidge in his evidence plainly says that he acts as he likes, regardless of law or litradicting the theories of Mr. Dum and others), and that therefore he gives them when he thinks fit. He is then asked if he wishes the monopoly to be thrown open; to which he replies (as his interest prompts, like most of the other theatrical witnesses), "Not entirely; I conceive the patent theatres should in some measure be protected, and, in fact, theatres generally. I do not think it should go in that sweeping way which it is imagined is intended. I conceive if plays produced at the patent theatres or minor theatres in London or out of London were the property of those persons producing them for at least twenty-one years, the effect would be entirely answered. I do conceive, after the plays have been performed twenty-one years in the major or minor theatres, if they become public property, the full end would be answered .- Do you wish more theathe multiplying of theatres would increase vice tres to exist than exist at present? I am afraid and crime, because, as he observes, the environs there already are too many; because on the faith of theatres are always notorious for a profusion of licenses and on the faith of protections, large of both - we do not know that we can go all property has been risked on the minor theatres theatres are springing up applying for neither protection or license. How far that may be conceived beneficial to the drama, I am not at liberty to give an opinion."

Some more of this individual's testimony throws an amusing light upon the remunera-tion of authors, and the arts by which theatres sometimes try to attract notoriety.

" How is an author remunerated at your theatre? Much in the same way as at the patent theatres. Authors who have been successful in some instances at the patent theatres, are the authors at the minor theatres. The author of the Rent-day, which has been instanced as the most profitable production at Drury Lane, was the author of a number of pieces at the Coburg Theatre.—Do you know what is the general mode of remuneration? Sometimes a stipulated sum of money; at times I have given 50%. and at other times 20%.- Has an author any nights? Not besides .- That is the case sometimes? Occasionally; at other times the author will receive half-a-guinea or a guinea a night for each night the play is performed.—Is that the whole remuneration; does he retain no right in the play after? Certainly; the entire copyright.—Then he has no right to any subsequent remuneration at the theatre? Not any other remuneration beyond the run of the play, when he has received his stipulated sum. Abroad their rights extend to a very considerable length of time? I am aware of that; but it is not the case in England .- Has an author a right to any remuneration from country theatres?-No; when once the piece is published, it becomes, according to the present system (out of London, at least), public property. All persons who can get a copy of the piece, play it without advantage to the author or the person who has the convicient copyright.

George the Third was prohibited, was it not? No; I think I played it nine or ten weeks, and the theatre was visited by the different branches of the government, and they could not see any thing obnoxious; but at the next licensing day, the magistrates, who held discretionary power, told me they thought such representations injudicious, if not improper, representing sacred characters and the highest personages in the realm.—You are now representing the old piece Tom Thumb? They are not sacred characters.—The king and queen are introduced into that? King Arthur and Queen Dollaloila.—You leave people to apply them as they please? Yes; if we find them a piece, we are not compelled to find them comprehension .- You think there is no danger of the magistrates giving you the same hint at the next licensing day as to Tom Thumb ?-It is played as it has been played for the last fifty years, without the alteration of a single line. -But the play-bill does not announce it in the usual way? No; I do not defend that playbill. It was issued during my absence from town at another establishment I have; and I was much annoyed at it on my return, for I conceive managers of theatres have nothing to do with politics or party; they are open to all parties, and they have nothing to do with one party or the other. I must take the onus upon myself, but I do not for a moment defend it .-Does it draw? As much as Tom Thumb would generally draw.—Not more? Certainly would generally draw.—Not more: Certainly not. — Why should not you give it as Tom ferring by gesture to striking passages in these Works. As almost all the most eminent actors think it was unnecessary, if not injudicous belonging to the theatre appear on this occa—Why was it continued? It was stopped on the sight of them alone is sufficient to attract the country visitors in London, were communication from Mr. Roe, the magistrate of Bow Street.—And that play-bill has not No. -What been issued since your return? do you give for the average run of new pieces, melo-drames, and so forth? About 201. I should conceive."

Mr. Serle's evidence goes in favour of throwing open the monopoly, and compensating the patent theatres by means of a lottery. Respecting the causes of the decline of the drama,

"Some of those which have been adduced, I think, may mean something, such as the lateness of the dinner-hours; but I think the great cause of the decline of the drama has been its separation from the literature of the country. It has become a difficult matter in the theatres to hear the language of a play from the size; consequently managers have been obliged to resort to spectacle: the public have left off going to see and to hear, and, consequently, the stage itself has deteriorated in public estimation. - Do you consider that the saloons attached to the theatres have any influence either in promoting the attractions of the theatres, or in decreasing the respectability? I think that they have done a great deal towards destroying that constant attendance upon the theatres of respectable people, which they were in the habit of giving before. I do not know what was the practice in Garrick's time; but I am quite sure that they would never have been attached to the theatres by the actors themselves, who would never have ventured upon such a breach of morality for the purpose of attracting the public. - Whom do you consider that that breach of morality arises from? From those who have a share in the theatres: from those who have rebuilt them. — Did they not exist in the old theatres? They might; but I do not think they are the kind of alliance which the actors themselves would have sought as an attraction."

DRAMA. DRURY LANE.

On Saturday the pageant in commemoration of Sir Walter Scott was produced here, with great ¿clat, and has been represented every night since to admiring audiences. The feeling with which it is witnessed must depend very much on the mood of mind of the spectator. The general effect is certainly very impressive. The curtain drawn, and Abbotsford, with all the lovely scenery of the Tweed, admirably and feelingly painted by Stanfield, is exhibited to the view. A hatchment indicates the loss which the world has just sustained by the death of the owner of that mansion; which we trust will never be suffered to depart from the race of Scott, but stand, with all its collected contents (so indicative of the character of him who placed them there), an everlasting memorial of his national heart and literary pursuits. The pageant then commences: Cooper, as the Last Minstrel, recites a few appropriate and beautiful lines from the poem of that title; and groups of the principal characters in Waverley, the Fortunes of Nigel, Guy Mannering, the Bride of Lammermoor, Rob Roy, Ivanhoe, the Antiquary, the Heart of Mid Lothian, Peveril, the Lady of the Lake, the Legend of Montrose, and Kennilworth, pass in succession over the stage, rewill was it continued? It was stopped on my return to town; it was stopped in the course of a week. In fact, I received a polite it only to have a look at Macready, Braham, Farren, Power, Harley, T. Cooke, Serle, Bedford, Seguin, J. Russell, Templeton, Mrs. Glover, Mrs. Faucit, Mrs. C. Jones, and so many other supporters of the living drama. And the pleasure is much enhanced by the younger and fairer portion of the spectacle. Miss Phillips looks Queen Elizabeth to perfection. Mrs. Nesbitt, as Lucy Ashton, is all loveliness and pathos; while her sister, Miss A. Mordaunt, as Amy Robsart, is hardly less to be admired. Miss Ferguson as Isabella Wardour, Miss Cawse as Ellen (Lady of the Lake), Miss Faucit as Jeanie Deans, Miss Kenneth as Fenella, Miss Pearson (and since her marriage Mrs. Humby) as Rebecca, Miss Hyland as Martha Trapbois, Miss Betts as Diana Vernon, Mrs. Brudenell as Madge Wildfire, Miss Somerville as Countess of Derby, Mrs. Hughes as Alice Bridgenorth, &c. are charming in these various parts, in a great degree realising the poet's and the reader's fancies. Feeling thus, we rather doubt the intrusion of comic incident, as in Flibhertigibbet (Weiland), Sir Geoffrey Hudson (Master Marshall), Dumbiedykes (Ross) on his obstinate pony, and even Dalgetty (Power) on his horse Gustavus. If the imagination is truly touched by the pageant, these, however true, become incongruous through juxtaposition; but, after all, audiences are so mixed and different in tastes, that what may jar on one may be the most entertaining to another. The second and last scene shews us Scott's beloved study, and all the creations of his mind we have mentioned ranged around his bust. The effect is almost overpowering, though a little marred by the flight of an ordinary child-and-spangled-muslin genius who flies up after crowning the bard with laurel in front of a Grecian temple. More solemnity might be given here—and Scott had nothing to do with Greek temples; his name is for ever associated with altogether different objects. Cooper again recites some fine poetry, and Braham sings in his most touching style; the banners are low-ered (they should go to the ground) and the curtain falls. The idea is an excellent one, and the representation is honourable to the talent and enterprise of the theatre.

On Wednesday we were again delighted with Der Freischüts, and Braham in full voice; Bedford excellent in Caspar; J. Russell, a Kilian worthy of Harley; Seguin, in song, a capital Bernhard; Miss Betts correct and effective in Linda; and Miss Cawse a real Rose. The music throughout well executed. and Mrs Pringle, acted as well as a little comedy can be by Farren and Mrs. Glover, aided by Miss Cawse, Mrs. Humby, and the less prominent characters, continues to dismiss the house in good humour to their homes. We regret to see a run made by part of the press against the author of this piece, for taking his groundwork from the French. His effort set forth no pretensions; and the ability with which he has performed his task, ought to recommend him to favour, rather than censure, for doing well what so many of his compeers often do ill, and yet obtain praise from the very same quarters which abuse him. This is not even-handed justice.

COVENT GARDEN.

On Friday, last week, All's Well that ends Well restored the universal favourite R. Jones to the public, after a six years' absence, in the part of Parolles. He was received with the stock of amusement which it offers when confided to such talent. The play itself, with musical introductions by Rophino Lacy from Rossini, Paer, Auber, &c. did not seem to make a hit; and has been only once repeated this peculiarly interesting to geologists is, that Some of the songs, &c. by Wilson, Miss Shirreff, and Miss Inverarity, were extremely pleasing; but the effect of the whole was heavy. We are glad, therefore, to observe that many novelties are announced, especially as it would appear, by a note from our noticing correspondent of the Unrehearsed Stage Effects, that the very dresses in All's Well that ends of Catherine of Cleves, Mesdames Inversity and Shirreff wear the same dresses they appeared in in The Haunted Tower; and the rest are from Henry the Eighth, Der Frieschütz, Cintributed to the formation of the 'new' ward-robe; and England, Bohemia, Verona, and Heaven knows what other countries, or in what ages, contribute to render 'correct' the dressing of a play, the scene of which is laid in France."

ADELPHI.

WE have said nothing of the Adelphi these two weeks, because it is so popular with its course of old pieces that it has had no occasion to resort to new. Certes, for three hours' amusement, it could hardly invent better; and the theatre fills accordingly. But we do want to see Mrs. Yates again, were it only for a bonne bouche.

OLYMPIC.

THE same round of pieces have gone on as per last, Miss Murray adding to her reputation every succeeding night in Mary Dobbs, till Thursday, when she appeared in her second character as Mary in the Dumb Belle. It was marked with great nature and simplicity, and yet not deficient in sprightliness and grace. The applause she elicited ought to have sustained the fair actress; whose trepidation, on the contrary, almost overcame her at last. She should feel greater assurance, for she is already high in public favour.

UNREHEARSED STAGE EFFECTS.

Drury Lane. October 11.—Der Frieschütz. Mr. Bedford, as Caspar, having duly explained the vital necessity of firing the sixth bullet, or last but one, levelled his rifle, which, though charged with a magic and unerring ball, made no report save that of the trigger's futile click, and no flash save of the sparks which issued from the pan. As to manifest disappointment would have muddled the plot of the play, by admitting the failure, Mr. Bedford marched off as though all were right, and as though the audience, of course, thought so.

Covent Garden. October 15.—Mr. Butler, as Hamlet, enters in the second act reading a volume of The Keepsake, with its red watered silk cover, gilt title at the back, plates and all. Every one recognises, and, of course, laughs at it.

Coal Mine .- A very abundant coal mine, it is stated in the Manchester Guardian, has been discovered at Pendleton; and what renders the strata has been found under red sandstone, and at the depth, severally, of 144 and 226 yards from the surface.

Licensing Theatres. - At the Middlesex county sessions on Thursday, applications for licensing twenty-one new theatres were made, and all refused, except one, we believe. Some which had taken a temporary license for them-Well are not only inappropriate, but old. He selves were also rejected; and it seems pretty writes us, that "Abbot's dress pertains to the clear that the question, whether we shall have Romeo and Juliet collection, Wilson's to that two or three dozen of little theatres acting independently of authority, or whether we shall have the law (conflicting and dubious as it is) enforced, must now be brought to issue.

Anecdote of Sir W. Scott .- Sir Walter Scott. when at Rome for a short time, about two months ago, was in a very weak state of health, where, says a letter from a sculptor there, " I had the honour of being introduced to him by a very particular friend of his. He was very cheerful and agreeable, and, though very much improved in his general health and speech since he left England, it was necessary to pay the greatest attention to understand him. was always lame, though since his attack he has become much more so, and he now walks with difficulty. Can you believe, that although in Rome near a month, he never once went to the Vatican; he went to Frascoli, a small village about twelve miles from Rome, where Cardinal York passed the latter part of his life, and was very anxious to glean any parti-culars concerning him. He likewise went to see an old castle of the middle ages at Bracciano, belonging to Tortonia, who, from having purchased the estates, inherits the title of Duke of Braccia, every part of which he examined with the greatest attention."

Fine Arts. — It has been some time in contemplation to open the Suffolk Street Gallery during the winter with an exhibition of the works of dead English artists, contrasting them with the productions of the living school. If paintings of our elder masters could be brought together, the collection would be most interesting; for many of them are hardly known out of private mansions, and are, nevertheless, of great merit.

Lectures on the Ear. - On Monday week Mr. Curtis commenced his lectures for the season, at the Royal Dispensary for Diseases of the Ear. The lecturer took occasion to remark, that nearly twenty years had elapsed Whirlwind.—In the end of April an extratomy, physiology, and pathology of the ear; tomy, physiology, and pathology of the ear; tomy, physiology, and pathology of the ear; the Annuals still press so temporarily on our weekly sheet, that we have again allotted a larger space to them treatment pursued at the institution, which had relieved above 15,000 patients, had not and accompanied by a rumbling noise. In its only been successfully employed in this counsince he delivered his first course on the ana-gratulations due to one who has so largely con-course it tore up trees, dismantled houses, de-try, but also in France, Germany, and Ameon ottorrhœa, and deafness and dumbness diseases of the most formidable character. Many discoveries had been made by chance, many from observation; and of the latter class was the important one he had now the pleasure of communicating to the profession, viz. that in treating cases of deafness conjoined with amaurosis, or gutta serena, frequently the worst species of blindness, he had, by attending to the local and constitutional treatment, while removing the deafness, frequently succeeded in restoring sight, without the pain and uncertainty of an operation; and from what he had seen during his long and extensive practice in diseases of the ear, he was convinced that remedies of a similar nature were equally efficacious in those of the eye, if had recourse to in the incipient stage. At the conclusion, the lecturer traced the connexion of the nerves of the eye and ear; and remarked on the important function of the ganglionic plexus of nerves, and particularly on the great sympathetic, which by its communications with the principal parts of the body, exercises a leading influence on the organs of hearing and sight; and the derangement of which is often the cause of disease connected with the semilunar ganglion and solar plexus. As illustrative of his views of disease, he exhibited some rare and valuable preparations of the eye and ear, which excited much interest. The whole lecture was highly instructive and gratifying. We observe the lecturer has in the press, besides a second edition of his "Essay on the Deaf and Dumb," a Treatise on the Diseases of the Eye, with a new method of curing incipient blindness by external applications and constitutional treatment, whereby the pain and uncertainty of operations may be avoided.

DATENT PLAYING CARDS. PATENT PLAYING CARDS.
DELABUE and Co. beg to announce that their Patent Playing Cards are just published, and may be had of all Stationers. The usual mode of soaping cards, to give them a temporary silp, but which occasions a most unpleasant moisture, and renders them so difficult to deal, is entirely supersocied in the Patent Cards, which are manufactured on new principles, and possess a peculiarly dry ivory feel: the perfection to which they are brought in silp, viracity of colouring, and general supearance, can be appreciated only by contrasting them with the very lest cards hitherto manufactured. The backs of the Patent Cards are perfectly unique: they may be had in a greater variety of patterns and colours than ever offwed to the public; richly embossed, in gold, silver, or ruby, and are warranted not to rub up, and free from all injurious preparations of white lead, sold under the name of enamelied cards.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The Life of General the Right Hon. Sir David Baird, Bart. &c. 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1832. Bentley.

Or the two volumes of which this memoir is advertised to consist, we have the first before us; and having satisfied ourselves that it is not likely to disappoint the very great in-terest entertained by the public respecting it, we lose no time in submitting an anticipatory notice, with some extracts relating to the early career of the highly esteemed and dis-tinguished hero who is the subject of this biography, which, we think, cannot be perused without much gratification by every reader, nor without deep emotion by those of the military

To this profession Sir David Baird was a model: noble-minded, upright, and splendidly brave. His adventures and deeds as a soldier, too, have all the variety and intenseness of romance; and, on viewing their record, we can frankly say, with the full recollection of Admiral Collingwood's delightful history upon our mind, that, combining greater individuality and vicissitude of service, the Life of Sir David Baird possesses in other respects all the attractions of those Memoirs—it is, indeed, (and what higher encomium could we bestow?) the biography of a military Collingwood.

Sir David Baird was the fifth son of Baird of Newbyth, Berwickshire; and born in Deember 1757. At the early age of fifteen he entered the army, for which every qualification of soul and body eminently fitted him, and proceeded to Gibraltar, for a season. On his return he was promoted into Lord Macleod's gallant regiment of Highlanders (the 73) and results its effort to the contract of the process of t the 73d); and went with it, after the unfortunate mutiny at embarkation, to India, in 1779_80.

At this period our Indian empire was in a very precarious state; and the melancholy war with Hyder Ali shortly ensued. In this Captain Baird was engaged; and from the details

*Having been so long before the public, and our principles, we may trust, from our extended influence in literature, truly appreciated, it is not for the sake of our own Journal, but in justice to publishers, that we repeat here our inflexible rule with regard to all works of which we have copies previous to their appearance in the bookselers shops: —if our opinion is favourable to them we have no hesitation in stating it, and shewing by extracts the grounds on which we have formed our judgment; if, on the contrary, our opinion is unfavourable, we hold ourselves bound, in common fairness, not to take advantage of a civility, whence we have a knowledge which we could not otherwise have acquired, to depreciate the enerprise in question; and we are alient till it is fully before the world. As we have said, we, for ourselves, utterly despise the venal attempts so disgracefully persevered in by most notorious puffers, to misrepresent this honourable course as a system of puffing; but these attempts are tenfold reprehensible as they are directed to injure the property of individual publishers, and impugn the general character of the press. And, after all, what have the reviewers or readers of books to do with the persons the reviewers or readers of books to do with the persons the merit sor demerits of what they produce. For the literary Gazette we shall only add, that it challenges calumny itself to name the works which, during fifteen year, it has praised, and which have not been received with public approbation; or the works which it has condemned, and which have not been received with public approbation; or the works which it has condemned, and which have not been received

we shall select the first of our illustrations, | ment the heads of the different columns of reserving for our ensuing number the glorious contrast which awaited him in the conquest of Seringapatam. Colonel Baillie was endeavouring to form a junction with Sir Hector Munro, but Hyder "had obtained accurate intelligence of the movement of this detachment, and accordingly despatched a strong body to intercept it. Colonel Fletcher and Captain Baird, however, having reason to suspect some project of the sort, suddenly altered their line of march, and by a wide détour, which, although it added to their fatigue, insured their safety, succeeded in joining Colonel Baillie on the morning of the 9th, having, nevertheless, fallen in with Hyder's picquets, close to his position at Perambaukum. The troops of this detachment, wearied as they were, were permitted to halt only till the evening, when the whole force marched, under the command of Colonel Baillie, to join Sir Hector Munro. Hyder had again obtained the most correct intelligence of their movements, and taking advantage of the necessary delay in the return of this gallant body of troops, enfiladed every part of the road by which they were to march with artillery, and placed his best infantry in ambuscade at every available point. The English troops had not proceeded more than four miles, when an alarm was given that the enemy was on their flank. They immediately formed, but finding the attack was not serious, continued their march. The road lay through an avenue of banyan trees, with a jungle on either side, and upon their entrance into this road, they were again attacked on the flank, by the enemy's opening two or three guns, and commencing a fire of some musquetry from the thick part of the jungle. They instantly halted, and immediately afterwards endea-voured to take the guns, but the darkness frustrated their efforts; and then it was, that Colonel Baillie determined to halt till day-light - a determination at first sight incompatible with the admitted necessity of making the march by night; while it not only afforded an opportunity to the enemy to draw off his cannon to another and stronger point, which the English had inevitably to pass in the morning, but practically announced to Tippoo the exact position in which he had checked them, and moreover of suggesting to Hyder the importance of advancing, in order to take advantage of their unexpected halt. Colonel Baillie's words, explanatory of his decision, addressed to Captain Baird, were, 'that he was determined to halt till day-light, that he might have an opportunity of seeing about him.' At day-light they accordingly re-commenced their march, and as the column moved out of the avenue into the plain, a battery of ont of the avenue into the plain, a battery of eight guns opened upon it, supported by a strong body of cavalry and infantry. Baillie immediately ordered Captains Kennedy and Gowdie, with the native grenadiers, to attack most of the guns, and in driving back the

Hyder's army appeared, (Hyder having passed Sir Hector Munro in the night,) moving down upon the line, which induced Kennedy and Gowdie immediately to call off their detachment from the captured guns to join the main body. At this juncture Baillie formed his force, consisting of little more than three thousand men, in line upon the bank of an old nullah, or water-course, and opened his guns upon the enemy. But Hyder, too powerful an antagonist for a mere handful of men, so disposed his immense army, as completely to surround him, and commenced a destructive fire upon him from his artillery in every direction. The various descriptions of this memorable and most unequal contest, however, all agree in confirming the belief, that vast as was the disparity between the contending armies, and although Hyder had upwards of seventy pieces of cannon in the field, the day would have been won by the English, if the fortune of war had not been so decidedly against them. The enemy were repeatedly and continually repulsed, their infantry gave way, while their cavalry were falling in all directions, and, it is said, Hyder was only prevented from retreating, by the persuasions of Colonel Lally, who represented to him, that retiring would bring him in contact with Sir Hector Munro, who was in his rear; and at this moment, and while the English were actually sustaining the combined attack of Hyder and his son Tippoo, two of their tumbrils exploded, and in an instant the brave men who were on the eve of gaining one of the most splendid victories ever achieved, were deprived of their ammunition, and the services of all their artillery. In this helpless, dreadful state, under a heavy and tremendous fire of cannon and rockets, these gallant but unfortunate soldiers remained from half-past seven until nine o'clock. The slaughter of the British began to be tremendous, as the enemy closed in upon them on every side. Colonel Fletcher had carried off the grenadier company of the 73d to support the rear-guard, and was never heard of more. Hyder Ali came with his whole army on their right flank, charging them with columns of horse, while the infantry kept up a heavy fire of musketry. These were followed by the elephants and Mysore cavalry, which completed the over-throw of the gallant band of heroes. In the midst of this, Colonel Baillie, wounded as he was, formed his men into a square, and, without ammunition, received and repulsed thirteen different attacks of the enemy's squadrons. At length the case became evidently hopeless, and the sepoys, under Captain Lucas, having been broken and dispersed, Colonel Baillie, seeing that further resistance was vain, tied his handkerchief on his sword as a flag of truce, and ordered Captain Baird, who was now second in command, to cease firing. Hyder's officers refused to attend to Colonel Baillie's signal, them; they did so, and succeeded in taking pointing to the sepoys who in their confusion most of the guns, and in driving back the were still continuing to fire; this, however, troops who supported them. Seringapatam. Nothing can exceed the hormiserable sufferers, who were not at once redeath by these animals, were doomed to linger out a wretched existence, exposed during the day to the raging heat of a vertical sun, and should day to the raging heat of a vertical sun, and should dispersely. When Hyder moved through the night to the ravages of tigers and his camp, he separated his prisoners, kept jackals, allured to the scene of their misery by the scent of human blood. Hyder, who, naturally apprehensive of pursuit from Sir Hector Munro, had retreated after the action to Damal, six miles from the field of battle, gratified his vengeance by enjoying the sight of his prisoners and the heads of the slain, as he sat in his tent, enthroned, as it were, on a chair of state. Colonel Baillie, wounded as he was, was dragged to his presence on a cannon; and while he, and several other officers, in an equally dreadful condition, lay on the ground in the open air at his feet, they experienced the additional misery of seeing the heads of many of their late companions in arms presented to the heartless conqueror. Nay, to such a pitch of barbarity were his cruelties extended, that the duty of presenting these bleeding trophies of his victory was imposed upon the yet surviving English prisoners. One English gentleman in particular was forced to carry two heads to the tyrant, which proved to be those of his intimate friends Captain Phillips and Doctor Wilson. For every European head brought in, Hyder gave his people five rupees, and for every European prisoner alive, ten. Amongst the victims who had as yet escaped the misery of these scenes was Captain Baird. One of Hyder's horsemen, who found him wounded on the field, took charge of him, and, strange to say, had the humanity to give him a little water to drink. From loss of blood he fainted twice on his way towards the camp, and twice his guard and conductor stopped and waited for his recovery, in order to obtain the reward paid for bringing in a prisoner; but when the unfortunate sufferer a third time

And thus, by an almost miracu- crawled on, animated by the hope of reaching lous accident, the gallant Baird was preserved Sir Hector Munro's camp, which they naturally by Providence to revenge the fatal devastation concluded could be at no very great distance,

Sir Hector had, however, changed his route, rors of the scene which this defeat produced, and retreated rapidly. Captain Baird and his Amidst the wounded and bleeding English, the companions escaped for a time, but at length, horses and elephants of Hyder were paraded in the utmost misery, surrendered to the and marched in fiend-like triumph; and those French, who treated them kindly, but were obliged to send them as prisoners to their leased from their agonies, by being trampled to master, the eastern tyrant Hyder. They were thus added to their fellows who had survived Colonel Baillie, Captain Baird, and six others, with his camp; sent twenty-three officers not wounded to Bangalore in irons, and twentyseven wounded to Arnée, a fort near Arcot. The private soldiers were similarly disposed of.

While Hyder " was carrying on his operations against Arcot, the English prisoners were kept in the neighbourhood; their place of confinement was a tent, pitched in the skirts of a village, to which a black doctor was occasionally sent, to look at and dress their wounds. say occasionally, for it not unfrequently happened that several days passed without his taking the trouble to visit them. The consequences of this inhuman neglect were almost too dreadful to relate; but such was the state from the combined effects of negligence and the dreadful heat of the climate, that while they lay languishing in agony, their wounds were literally crawling with maggots. In this dreadful condition did they remain for a fortnight, when Captain Baird, together with Lindsay, Bentinck, and Wragg, were separated from Colonel Baillie (with whom Rumley and Fraser remained), and were marched to Se-

Here they were incarcerated in a hideous prison, and dreadfully ill-used.

" On the 10th of May, the French surgeon's visits were prohibited, and all the prisoners, except Capt. Baird, were put in irons, weighing about nine pounds each pair; and this seemed to be generally considered the first step of a deliberate system which had been adopted of ending their existence without absolute violence; and so it really proved to be. No reason, other than a desire of eventually exterminating and Colonel Baillie directed Captain Baird to noble-minded subject of our memoir, without hitherto escaped this additional cruelty through the humanity of those who had charge of them. without the privity or sanction of Hyder. It is in vain to attempt to describe the feelings of the captives when the order for their being ironed was announced to them; they remonstrated, but remonstrance was vain, and, as we have just said, the order was carried into effect.

We have here to call attention to a noble and magnanimous piece of conduct.

"When they were about to put the irons upon Captain Baird, who was completely disabled in his right leg, in which the wound was still open, and whence the ball had just then been extracted, his friend Captain Lucas, who spoke the language perfectly, sprang forward, and represented in very strong terms to the myar the barbarity of fettering him while in such a dreadful state, and assured him that death would be the inevitable termination of Captain Baird's sufferings if the intention were persisted in. The myar replied, that the circar had sent as many pair of irons as there were prisoners, and they must be put on. Captain Lucas then offered to wear two sets himself, in order to save his friend. This noble act of generosity moved the compassion even of the myar, who said he would send to the keeladar to open the book of fate. He did so : and when the messenger returned, he said the book had been opened, and Capt. Baird's fate was good; and the irons were in consequence not put on at that time. Could they really have looked into the volume of futurity, Baird would undoubtedly have been the last man to be spared."

We cannot pursue the whole particulars of the atrocious barbarities practised on our hapless countrymen during their protracted confinement of three years and eight months, except. ing those whom sufferings and murder removed from their earthly sorrows. A few extracts will speak for the rest.

"On the 17th of March, Colonel Baillie's irons, and those of Captain Rumley and Lieutenant Fraser, were taken off; those of Captain Baird were removed on the 9th of April, on account of his sickness. The next day, Lieu-tenant Lind's irons were removed; and on the 14th he died.

The end of the gallant Lucas, and other affecting circumstances, are thus told :

"At this period symptoms of violent disease exhibited themselves amongst the captives; but all applications to the keeladar for medicine, or to which the unhappy sufferers were reduced from the combined effects of negligence and On the 5th of July died Captain Lucas, whose conduct towards Captain Baird, which we have recorded, will speak volumes in his praise, and whose amiable and engaging manners, and cheerfulness and vivacity of temper, made his loss a matter of deep calamity to his fellow-sufferers. On the 7th died Mr. Hope, Captain Baird's particular friend, and the eldest son of Sir John Hope; a slight medicine would have relieved—saved him—but it could not be obtained. On the 9th, Ensign Machonochy also fell a victim to similar barbarity. Capt. Baird himself at this period was suffering dreadfully from dysentery; and he has often described the torture, when under the blessing of Providence he was recovering, that he experienced from hunger, which the scanty prison allowance did not afford the means of allaying, even with the coarsest food. He used frequently to declare, that the inclination he felt to snatch a portion of their food from others was almost the soldier was exhausted, and he left him to die. Here then, stretched upon the ground, covered with wounds, still bleeding, lay the transpired at the time, that they had only the greatest eagerness and delight. During as much pay as they received in our army, as many horses, palanquins, and wives, as they chose, and promised that they should be considered and treated as his children. Of course, these offers never obtained a moment's consideration. The prisoners assured the emissaries of the tyrant that nothing in the world could tempt them to serve any sovereign except their own, and desired never again to be insulted by a repetition of such a proposal. Towards the close of the year 1782, the arrival of European prisoners became very numerous; and most of them had, previous to their arrival, been forced to embrace the Mahommedan religion, and undergo all the frightful ceremonies connected with its adoption. On the 13th of November Colonel Baillie expired; an event which, it should seem, had been anticipated and provided for by the tyrant; for during the whole course of his confinement, and his severe and painful illness, he never received medicine or assistance, nor even the advice of a medical man. The second year of their captivity was now drawing to a termination."

The death of the tiger Hyder made no change in the sad fate of the survivors; on the contrary, the hypocrite and bigot Tippoo almost augmented their sufferings. Of this, we give a touching example :-

" Having felt it necessary to attract the reader's attention to the case of General Matthews, it may be as well to conclude the sad history of that ill-fated officer with another extract from the journal. Sept. 8th, 1783. The washerman gave us the melancholy account of General Matthews's death. He died the 7th; and at the time he departed this life he was in irons. The general, when he learnt from a combination of suspicious circumstances, as well as hints let fall from those who were occasionally about his person, that it was the sultan's intention to cut him off by poison, was afraid to taste the victuals that were sent to him, at stated times, from the keeladar; some of the guards, and even the servants who carried the poisoned food, took compassion, and gave him some of theirs. The havildar, who had charge of the general, connived at these acts of humanity at first; but when it was found that General Matthews still protracted his melancholy existence, this officer was sent for by the keeladar, who told him that the general's life, if much longer continued, must be paid for by the havildar's death. Upon this the havildar communicated his orders with the threat that accompanied them, to his unfortunate prisoner, who had now no alternative left but perishing by poison or famine. The anxious love of life for several days maintained a struggle with the importunate calls of hunger. These, however, prevailed in the issue of the contest: he ate of the poisoned food; and drank too, whether to quench the rage of inflamed thirst, or to drown the torments of his soul in utter insensibility of the poisoned cup; within six hours after this fatal repast he was found dead. This is a faithful and true account of the death of Lieut.-Gen. Matthews, which has been set forth in various ways. October the 3d, the prisoners heard that their companions, Rumley, Fraser, and Sampson, had been poisoned at Mysore on the 5th; they received further information from Comrah Sepoy, a Tanjore man, that eighteen or twenty officers confined at Kavel-Drook, had been not this period Hyder sent some of his principal soned by order of Tippoo. On the 9th of Notion upon which their safety or preservation officers to endeavour to induce the English to vember, Lieutenant Butler died absolutely of hung, was, whether was Stringer to be carried enter his service. He offered them three times neglect. From this time, until the 7th of March, before the keeladar, or not? Their satisfaction 1784, another dismal period of five months, nothing but increasing arrivals of European Mussulmans occurred to vary the sameness of the scene; but on that day one of the prisoners became insane; and, during the paroxysms of his dreadful disorder, unfortunately raved upon subjects the most vitally important to the hopes and interests of his almost bewildered companions. This officer, Lieutenant Stringer, unluckily knew the language so perfectly as to converse fluently with his guards, and the first act of his insanity was to go to the officer on duty, and request that he might be permitted to speak to the keeladar, as he had something of the greatest importance to communicate to him. The consternation occasioned amongst the other prisoners by this application is not to be described: there was no possibility of guessing what a madman might say, actuated as he was by a spirit of animosity against his fellow-sufferers, upon whom he was prepared to charge the intention of poisoning him. They had, amongst others, one very serious cause of alarm; for, although the use of pen and ink was prohibited on pain of death, they had contrived to obtain them, and several of the officers kept journals; and, as we have already shewn. corresponded with prisoners in other places of confinement. It was quite clear, that if this very important infringement of the regulations was detected, the extreme punishment awarded for it would be inflicted. In these trying cir. cumstances it was debated, whether it would not be expedient, for the common safety, to smother the unhappy maniac during the night. Against this barbarous proposition, suggested only by the natural feeling of self-preservation, Capt. Baird resolutely opposed himself; and, although he did so upon the high principles of feel ing and duty, he made it appear to those, who were but little inclined to put sentiment in op-position to security in such an extremity, that t would be most inexpedient, as a matter of policy, and that the sudden death of one of them, who had manifested a desire to make some communication to the keeladar, would certainly cause a dreadful consternation, which even the wild disclosures of the lunatic himself might not have the effect of producing. At the same time, he entreated his companions to wait the event of the morning, and to occupy the previous hours of the night in disposing of all written documents which they might have in their possession. In pursuance of this advice, the party proceeded to burn some of their papers, digging holes and hiding others, or depositing them under the tiles of the prison, until some future period; and in the course of the night, they destroyed upwards of a hundred sheets of paper, which they had collected, by stealth. in order to amuse themselves by learning different languages. Nor was it alone that for their own sakes they were so anxiously engaged : it was quite certain that all those who had contributed to the clandestine introduction of the prohibited materials would have been equally compromised. Nothing could be more dreadful than this night. The unhappy maniac, with a pair of irons weighing nine pounds, began to walk about the prison at five o'clock in the evening, and continued to do so incessantly at a rapid pace until two in the morning, vowing the most terrible vengeance against all his fellow-sufferers. Next morning the myar came, and asked to see Stringer; and at this moment before the keeladar, or not? Their satisfaction can scarcely be imagined when they found that the keeladar declined seeing him, and had authorised the myar to receive any communi-cation he might have to make. This was another awful moment of suspense to his companions, who now gathered round him, and of course were unable to anticipate the nature of his charge or communication. After much delay, the effect of which was greatly to prejudice the myar against him, Stringer said that his life was in danger, that a conspiracy had been formed against him, and, as a proof of the fact, he drew from his pocket a piece of bread which he affirmed was poisoned. Captain Baird was next him at this moment; the myar seemed struck by the proof adduced, when Baird, having stated that the man was mad, and not to be credited, snatched the bread from his hand, and ate it; thus, by a prompt and judicious movement, terminating an affair which, even in its lightest consequences, might have been to the captives a matter of the most serious importance. The unfortunate officer was afterwards confined in a lunatic asylum, at Madras, where, many years afterwards, Captain Baird saw him. It was just at this time that a guard who had been for some time placed over Captain Baird, but who had been ordered to a hill fort called Assec-Droog, with the officers of General Matthews, returned; he appeared melancholy and cast down, and extremely shy of communicating with the prisoners, although, before his de-parture, he had been on remarkably friendly terms with them. At length, however, the mystery was solved, and he disclosed the fatal history to which we have before cursorily alluded, of the death of sixteen of General Matthews's officers, who had been poisoned with the milk of the cocoa-nut tree. Besides these it was ascertained, that Lieutenant Matthews of the Bengal establishment, brother to the unhappy General, and Lieutenant Wredon, of the Bombay army, were, by Tippoo's orders, taken out of the fort at Bednore, at ten o'clock at night, carried to a retired place overgrown with grass, and there cut to pieces. Indeed, it was certain that orders had actually been issued by the sultan, to murder all the English officers his service, but that intelligence having arrived missioners for negotiating a treaty of peace had most affecting:

At length the liberation of these brokenhearted men approached, and the account is

"The whole prison resounded with the frantic voice of excessive joy and exultation. 'This tumult,' says the writer, 'having in some degree subsided, a proposal was made, and most heartily embraced, to collect all the ready money in our possession, without the least regard to shares or proportions, and to celebrate our approaching deliverance with a regale of plantain fritters and sherbet, the only articles of luxury we could command, on account of our extreme poverty. By nine o'clock at night, supper was announced, consisting of sixty dozen of plantain fritters, and a large chatty of sherbet; every one being seated on the ground, the repast was received with the utmost content and satisfaction. Friends and toasts were drunk as long as our chatty stood out; and such was the feelings of all the prisoners were worked up the agitation of our minds, that there was not so the highest pitch of excitement. deed, who possessed the power, to compose himself to sleep. We now waited with the utmost impatience for the return of day, and were impressed with a strong desire that our irous might be knocked off immediately; but, to our great mortification, there arrived, about seven in the morning, only one armourer. Every one struggled to have his fetters knocked off first : promises, threats, bustling and jostling, every expedient that could be imagined was put in practice, in order to obtain that which would come unsought, in the course of a few minutes, or hours at farthest. The same men who had suffered for years the rigours of imprisonment and the menaces of a barbarous policy, with invincible patience and resolution, as well as with general sympathy, were so transported by the near prospect of liberty, that the delay of a few moments seemed now to be more insupportable than even the tedious languor of our long, most alarming, and anxious confinement. About two or three in the aftermoon our irons were all knocked off, and we were conducted to the keeladar.' Their limbs being released from restraint, they joined their former companions, Baird and the others, and proceeded with them to Soomua Pettah; on their arrival at which place, having an opportunity of conversing with the soldiers, they had the gratification of receiving every mark of affection and respect from their humbler companions in arms. At Soomnah Pettah they were permitted to walk about, and bathe in the river. Every object and every recreation, however simple, became a source of ardent delight. All the satiety which the free enjoyment of the beauties of nature generates, had been overcome by years of restraint and abstinence; and the mere sight of the country, with all the advantages of scenery and climate, from which they had been so long excluded, excited of itself alone the most agreeable emotions in their hearts and minds. One physical fact is curious, but natural; although their irons were knocked off, it was a long time before these liberated prisoners recovered the use of their limbs, so as to walk with perfect freedom. ' Never,' says the writer of the journal, ' was the inveterate power of habit more forcibly displayed, than on this occasion; we could never get the idea of being in fetters out of our heads. No effort of our minds, no act of volition, could, for several days, overcome the habit of making the short and constrained steps to which we had been so long accustomed. Our crippled manner of walking was a subject of laughter to ourselves as well as to others."*

Hence they proceeded to Madras; and we have only to add, that, however difficult to convey an entire impression of this most interesting narrative, we trust we have been able to place such a picture before our readers as must be viewed with strong emotions. Our next shall shew the vanquished victors in a description no less striking.

The Literary Souvenir for 1833. Edited by Alaric A. Watts, Esq. London: Longman and Co.

A VERY delightful volume, the literary portion of whose contents entitle it to a foremost place among its competitors: there is some beautiful poetry, and the tales animated and original; we must say the editor has been fortunate in his contributors and judicious in his selections. Among the stories which have especially pleased us we would mention, " The Jacobite Exile and his Hound," by the author of "Three Nights in a Lifetime;" "The Sleeper's Shrift," by F. Chorley; "The Marsh Maiden," by Leitch Ritchie; "Beatrice Adony and Julius Alvinzi," by the author of "Recollections of the Peninsula;" "Retrospections of the Life of Secundus Parnell," by William Howitt; "Frank Lygon," by the author of "Selwyn."
"A Morning in Kensington Gardens," by Mrs. Alaric Watts, will best serve for the purpose of quotation, though we regret that our space will only admit a part.

"Among the many and heavy charges which our travelled countrymen are apt to bring door kind of existence, which is so highly valued and so rationally enjoyed by our continental neighbours. For the absence of these cheap pleasures, which are there shared in common both by the rich and the poor, the nature of our climate is usually made chargeable; and certainly we are, in this particular, far less happily circumstanced than they. And yet I think it may be fairly questioned whether the dissimilarity of our habits in this respect is not rather the result of the different character of our minds and feelings, than of any at-mospheric impediment; and whether this national distinction may not be briefly summed character. It would, I think, be a matter of no great difficulty, to assign a sufficient reason for this want of sympathy in the inhabitants of two nations placed by nature itself in such close approximation, did the discussion of such a question form any part of my present object. It is enough that such discrepancy does exist, and that its influence is perceptible in every thing that has relation to the two countries No sooner do we step across the Channel than we see the result of this expansiveness of feeling, if I may be allowed the expression, in the very face of the country itself. In the manners of the people; in their domestic relations; in their habits of business; in their business of pleasure; in their institutions, royal, scientific, domestic, and even religious. In all these their expansiveness of spirit is apparent, and forms a singular contrast to the more selfish characteristics of our own country, in which we are accustomed to carry our spirit of exclusiveness into the very temple of God himself, where the closely curtained pew seems to utter words, which with a slight variation we might adopt as our national motto as it regards each other, 'Stand off, for I am holier than thou.' from this want of geniality in ourselves, I think, rather than from any want of geniality in our climate, that our public gardens present mind. I had read of persons so different a spectacle from those on the continent. It is true that ours cannot boast the groves of orange-trees, the marble fountains, the antique statues of the Tuileries, but then apparent; where the huxter's stall derives its support from the walls of a royal palace; and seats which would disgrace the humblest cottage, are provided for the repose of its belles dames, under the very eyes of the Muses and Graces themselves! In extent, the gardens of Paris will bear no comparison with those of our own metropolis; neither in natural advantages, if we rank among them the seclusion which that extent affords, in their affluence of noble forest-trees, nor in their eligibility as places of promenade, when we compare the arid sand of the Champ Elysées and Tuileries with the emerald greensward and well-rolled gravel-walks of our own parks and gardens. Truly they require nothing save to be peopled by an equal number of happy faces to make them eclipse not only these, but the far-famed Sans Souci of other days. I have been led to make these reflections on calling to mind the deserted appearance which our own Kensington Gardens presented on one of the most delightful days of the early part of July."

Two or three groups, however, pass by; we must confine ourselves to one.

" Among the few equestrians in the circle, against their native land, one of the most I remarked especially one fashionable-looking common, and certainly the most plausible, is, woman; she was unattended save by a groom that we have none of that delightful out-of- and an Italian greyhound. My observation was more particularly attracted to her from the circumstance of her riding at a pace somewhat too rapid, as I thought, to be quite comme il faut; I was rather surprised than gratified, when after whirling some half-dozen times round the ring, I saw her advance towards the garden and proceed to dismount; and after throwing the rein on the neck of the noble steed, and addressing a few words to the servant, she entered the gardens. I cannot say that the impression made on my mind at a first glance, was very favourable. There was something cold, and hard, and masculine about her; it was a trifle (but the habit of up in two words, namely, the diffusiveness of mind is shewn as effectually in trifles, as in the French and the exclusiveness of the English things of moment), and I observed that she bestowed no mark of favour on the noble animal from which she had just dismounted, though he pawed the ground, and arched his neck, as if he were accustomed to receive, and conscious of deserving, some token of consideration at her hands. As for the beautiful Italian greyhound that had accompanied her in her ride, and which manifested an equal desire to attend her in her walk, he received an order in a stern voice, to 'stand back,' which mandate not meeting with instant attention, a slight stroke of the whip enforced obedience. There was something not quite agreeable in all this; and yet as she passed me, and the wind blew aside her veil, I could discover nothing of the Amazon in her countenance. On the contrary, she looked singularly feminine, despite her half-masculine attire. I was not much elated by this discovery; I did not like the idea of a favourite theory being dispersed by a breath of wind; more especially as evidence was not wanting that my impression was, on the whole, correct. For the lady seemed to entertain as strong a predilection other, for rapid walking as quick riding; she passed

^{*} It may not be uninteresting to the reader, to enumerate the articles which were manufactured by the prisoners during their captivity. We copy some:

"Sir David Baird used frequently to jest about his expertness in cutting out and making his own shirts. One of them he long kept as a memento of his captivity; but it was lost with his carriage and baggage, many years after, during Sir John Moore's retreat at Corunna. Cots of bamboo, made by means of an old knife, notched into a saw, the cot lashed with coarse rope made from the cocoa-mut. Cards, two folds of paper and one of cloth, stuck together with thick congee, and polished with the jaw-bone of a sheep. Ink made of lamp-black, with a little gum-water. One chatty was placed over another to collect the smoke of the wick, which was awept off every day. Pens of fowl quills."

other pedestrian had been added to our number, | was even menaced—he walked where dogs are in the person of a fashionable-looking man. I hardly knew why, but I could not help connecting his sudden appearance with that of the lady, whose manifestation of chagrin, if I were correct, was at once sufficiently accounted for; a 'tryst' which the gentleman is the last to remember, is certainly any thing but complimentary. Such was my inference :after all, I was right in my unfavourable impressions, for there is something peculiarly undignified in a clandestine interview; it argues a deficiency of moral courage; there is a want ashamed of avowing that which they are not afraid to do. I had just arrived at this satisfactory conclusion, when the parties met; and certainly, if they were lovers, their meeting was any thing but cordial. They did not shake hands; all the common courtesies of mere acquaintanceship seemed dispensed with by mutual consent; the fair one continued her walk, and the gentleman turned and accompanied her, and in a few minutes the parties were in appeared to be received with an air of affected nonchalance on the part of the lady, whose impressions." assumed indifference, by the way, seemed strangely contradicted by the nervous agitaof course entirely ignorant; but they pro-duced a marked effect on the manner of the we think, indispensable to an ann disdains reply to an unworthy accusation: they pursued their walk in silence for a considerable time, and at length seated themselves at a short distance from the place I occupied. I was rather uneasy; and began to fear that the lady had gone a little too far.
Ah! soliloquised I, it will require no little skill to lure the bird back to its accustomed jesses; and I was proportionably relieved on observing both parties tracing lines in the sand with their riding whips. This spoke of a better understanding and a milder temperature. By degrees the twain, who when they sat down, occupied the extreme corners of a seat, approximated; the gentleman changed his place for one close beside the lady; and when they rose, he took her hand and drew her arm within his, and retained it too, without any manifestation of displeasure on the part of the object thus unceremoniously treated. In a few minutes I had the satisfaction of observing the greyhound (that ill-used animal) bound across the fosse that separates the garden from the park, and meet with a most cordial welcome at his lady's hand. Whether, with the instinct of his kind, he had perceived her change of mood, or whether the presence of a well-known patron ensured him a better reception, I know not; but certainly his gambols were received with any thing but coldness. No stern 'stand back' repressed his frolics. No stroke of the whip ther the presence of a well known patron en-forbidden to walk-nay, where it is death to dogs to be seen; and he did all this with perfect impunity! After a few more turns, in which the steps of the party had nearly subsided into a loiter, I had the pleasure of again seeing the lady's face. The fever spot had vanished-the tremulous motion of the lip was exchanged for a bland smile; she looked more feminine than ever; and I wondered how I could ever have fancied there was aught of the Amazon about her. As for the suspicion of a clandestine interview, I was ashamed of myself of delicacy about it; no person ought to be for entertaining so unworthy a thought. They were affianced lovers - there was no concealment in the matter-

> The Amulet for 1833. Edited by S. C. Hall. London: Westley and Davis.

> THE aim of the work now before us has been to blend information and amusement; and the best tribute paid to its success is, as the editor states in his preface, that several of the papers have been republished, and widely circulated in other forms. Amid the interesting articles this year, we notice-" A Pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre," by the original and imaginative author of Contarini Fleming; "Wanderings of the Israelites," by the author of Letters from the East; and a curious "History of the Holy Cross," by Lord Mahon. There is a most touching and beautiful essay, called "Soldiers' Wives," by the Rev. C. B. Tayler; while Mrs. S. C. Hall has three stories, and all good. " Poor Rosalie," by Mrs. Opie, is the narrative, very prettily told, of the incident on which the popular drama of Fra Diavolo is founded. "Age and Youth," by S. Laman Blanchard; "the Emigrant," by given it a place in our poetical column; and "the History of the Holy Cross" is so singular a picture of the superstition of the darker ages, that we shall extract the principal portion.

" In the reign of the Emperor Constantine the Great, his mother Helena, when almost an octogenarian, undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. Her pious zeal was particularly directed to the search of the holy sepulchre, and of the cross on which Jesus Christ had suffered; and, according to her own judgment at least, she was successful in both. A vision, or perhaps a dream, disclosed the place of the holy sepulchre: the three crosses were found buried near it; and that of the Saviour is said to have been distinguished from the others by its healing powers on the sick, and even restoring a corpse to life. This discovery caused great and general rejoicing throughout Christendom. The spot was immediately consecrated by a church called the New Jerusalem; and of such magnificence, that the celebrated Eusebius is strongly inclined to look upon its building as the fulfilment of the prophecies in the Scriptures for a city of that name. A verse of the sibyl was also remembered or composed, which, like all predictions after the event, tallied in a surprising manner with the holy object so happily revealed. The greater share of the cross was left at Jerusalem, set in a case of silver, and the remainder was sent to Constantine, who, in hopes of securing the prosperity and duration of his empire, enclosed it within his own statue on the Byzantine forum. The pilgrims also, who thronged to Jerusalem during a long course of years, were always eager, and often successful, in obtaining a small fragment of the cross for themselves; so that at length, according to the strong expression of St. Cyril, the whole earth was filled with this sacred wood. Even at present, there is scarcely a Roman Catholic cathedral which does not display some pretended pieces of this relic; and it has been computed, with some exaggeration, that, were they all collected together, they might prove sufficient for building a ship of the line. To account for this extraordinary diffusion of so limited a quantity, the Catholic writers have been obliged to assert its preternatural growth and vegetation, which the saint already quoted ingeniously compares to the miracle of the loaves and fishes. That the guardians of this cross at Jerusalem should have had recourse to such evident and undoubted falsehood, should, I think, very much increase our doubts whether the cross itself was genuine, and whether the old age and credulity of Helena may not have been grossly imposed upon. Where we see one fraud, we may justly suspect another. From this period, however, the history of this fragment of wood may be clearly and accurately traced during the twelve succeeding centuries. In spite of its frequent partitions, the holy cross, say the monkish writers, thus remained undiminished at Jerusalem, receiving the homage of innumerable pilgrims, until the year 614, when this city was besieged and taken by the Persians. Their barbarous fanaticism reduced to ruins or burnt to the ground nearly all the sacred buildings, and made a great slaughter of the Christians, in which they are said to have been actively assisted by the resident Jews. The bishop and the relic in question were re-captivity it had happily escaped the pollution It was on the holy cross that Heracleonas of infidel hands; the case which contained it was brought back unopened to Jerusalem, and Heraclius himself undertook a journey in order to replace it in its former station on Mount Calvary. The prelude to this religious ceremony was a general massacre of the Jews, which the emperor had long withstood, but at length granted to the earnest and renewed entreaties of the monks of Alsik. The fact itself, and all its details, are so disgraceful to the parties concerned, that I would gladly reject it as false or overcharged, did it not rest on the authority of a patriarch of Alexandria. Heraclius then-attended by a solemn procession, but laying aside his diadem and purplebore the cross on his own shoulders towards the holy sepulchre. An officer was appointed to its peculiar care, with the title of Staurophulax; and the anniversary of this event, the 14th of September, is still celebrated in the Greek church as a festival, under the name of the Exaltation of the Cross. The relic did not long continue in the place to which the valour and piety of Heraclius had restored it, but was doomed to undergo still further vicissitudes of fortune. Only eight years afterwards (A.D. 636), an army of Arabs, the new and fervent proselytes of Mahomet, invaded Palestine. At the battle of Yermuk the imperial forces were totally routed; and Heraclius, downcast and dismayed, returned to Constantinople, bearing with him, as a source of consolation, the invaluable fragment, whose alleged miraculous powers were never exerted for its own protection. It is rarely that when a sovereign despairs of success, his subjects have the courage (it would, perhaps, be termed the disloyal pre-sumption) to prolong their resistance; but the inhabitants of Jerusalem were animated by religious zeal and local associations, and did not, till after a doubtful siege of several months, yield the holy city to the Saracens. The event soon justified the prudent foresight of Heraclius in removing the cross from the danger of Mahometan masters. The caliph of Omar experienced some difficulties in the construction of a mosque at Jerusalem; he immediately supposed those difficulties to be supernatural, and, by the advice of the Jews, destroyed a great number of the neighbouring crosses: so that it seems certain that the wood of the real crucifixion could still less have escaped the effects of his ignorant fanaticism. At Constantinople, on the contrary, it was preserved with the utmost veneration in the metropolitan church of St. Sophia, and the honours paid to it are attested and described by the father of English historians. Never, but on the three most solemn festivals of the year, was its costly case unclosed. On the first day, it received the adoration of the emperor and principal officers of state; on the next, the empress and chief ladies repeated the same ceremony; and the bishops and clergy were admitted on the third. While exposed to view on the altar, a grateful odour pervaded the whole church, and a fluid resembling oil distilled from the knots in the wood, of which the least drop was thought sufficient to cure the most inveterate disease. This precious fluid is also mentioned by Pope Gregory the Great in one of his letters to Leontius:—'I have received your present,' writes the pope, 'some oil of the holy cross and some wood of aloes, of which one confers blessing by its very touch, and the other, when burnt, diffuses a pleasant perfume.' In a period of several centuries, during which this relic re- of his subjects, Henry, the next year, on Easter mained at Constantinople, we find it occa- Day, announced that a new cross had been pre-swore to cherish and defend his nephews; it was to the same fragment that the son of Justinian the Second clung for protection, in the revolution which hurled his father from the throne: and we might entertain more respect for the superstition of the Greeks, if the supposed sanctity of this relic had produced either the observance of the oath or the safety of the suppliant. At length, in the year 1078, the object of my narrative recommenced its travels. A wealthy citizen of Amalfi, whose name is not recorded, had long felt a wish to exchange active life for the cloister, and had selected the monastery of Casinum-as the place of his future retirement. Being present in the eastern ca-pital during the tumultuous deposition of Michael the Seventh, he perceived in the general confusion a favourable opportunity for appropriating this precious fragment to himself. His zeal did not forget at the same time to secure the golden case, richly embossed with jewels, which contained it; and both were laid as a welcome offering before the shrine of St. Benedict, at Casinum. The good fathers must have felt no little pride when strangers beheld, in their secluded and obscure retreat, a relic which a long succession of the most illustrious princes had gloried in possessing. The next place to which we can trace the cross is Palestine, during the crusades, to which it had doubtless been conveyed for the purpose of restoring it to its more ancient and appropriate station at Jerusalem. In that country it was exposed to frequent hazards, as the crusaders appear to have been in the habit of bearing it in the van of their armies when marching against the Mussulmans, hoping by its presence amongst them to secure the victory. One of their battles against the forces of Saladin by no means fulfilled their expectations, and in the course of it the sacred relic itself was unfortunately severed; one half of it being captured by the enemy, and most probably destroyed. This untoward accident, however, by no means impaired their veneration for the remaining fragment; and, at the commencement of the thirteenth century, it is again recorded as taking the field with the King of Hungary and the Duke of Austria. From these it passed into the hands of their brother crusaders, the Latin sovereigns of Constantinople; and thus, by a singular train of circumstances, a change of dynasty restored this precious relic to the people which had so long enjoyed its possession. It does not, however, appear to have received the full measure of its ancient veneration; and a new crown of thorns, alleged to be that of the passion, held at this period a far higher rank with the public. In the year 1238, the pressure of poverty and impending ruin compelled the Emperor Baldwin the Second to sell what the piety of St. Louis, King of France, induced him as eagerly to purchase. A very considerable sum was given in exchange for the holy wood, and on its arrival in Paris it was deposited by King Louis in a chapel which he built on this occasion. There the cross remained for above 300 years, until at length, on the 20th of May, 1575, it disappeared from its station. The most anxious researches failed in tracing the robber, or recovering the spoil; and the report which accused King Henry the Third of having secretly sold it to the Venetians, may be considered as a proof of the popular animosity rather than of royal avarice. To appease in some degree the loud and angry murmurs sionally mentioned in the annals of the time. pared for their consolation, of the same shape, of. Nothing of the kind was ever even dreamt

'The people of Paris,' says Estoile, an eye-witness of this transaction, 'being very devout, and of easy faith on such subjects' (he is speaking of the sixteenth century), 'gratefully hailed the restoration of some tangible and immediate object for their prayers.' Of the original frag. ment I can discern no further authentic trace ; and here, then, it seems to have ended its long and adventurous career."

The great improvement in the pictorial department has been mentioned before, and we only allude to it here, that we may congratulate the editor on his success; a success so well deserved, by the modesty, the industry, good taste, and good feeling, which have so strongly though unobtrusively marked Mr. Hall's lite rary career.

Works of Lord Byron. Vol. XI. Murray. ONE of the jolly interlocutors in Blackwood's last Noctes Ambrosiana is made to express a sentiment which we suspect is any thing but peculiar to him, whoever he may be; namely. that the sight of this new edition of Byron is enough to stir the thought, "When shall we have the other poetical worthies of our thricepoetical era dealt with in this really satisfactory fashion?" With one exception, which we need not mention, none of our poetical contemporaries will ever command so much attention as Lord Byron; but we own we are quite of this compotator's mind, that whoseever may have to edit, post mortem, the opera omnia of any one of the true poets of this age, can follow no better model than what is afforded them in this annotated Byron. Crabbe sleeps with his fathers; and the sooner we see the same system applied to him the better. The "Newspaper," "the Village," "the Borough," are all eminently, if not chiefly, valuable, as pictures of a state of men and manners which may not be lasting; and since it is possible, if not probable, that the phasis of society, which they represent in such vivid colours, may be obsolete to our grandchildren — and most certain that that phasis, if it were but for that poetry, will be centuries hence a subject of interest and of study all over whatever may then be the civilised world-it is surely most " meet, fit, and necessary," that Crabbe should be dealt with forthwith as the editor before us has been and is dealing with Lord Byron. That Scott will be so dealt with anon, there can be little doubt; and richly instructive as have been that illustrious author's own already published confessions as to his works, who can question that much of even more interest, if not instruction. remains to be brought forth with respect to them, by those who have had access to his familiar conversation, and private diaries and correspondence? Long, as the Knight of the Noctes says, may it be ere we have any title to expect elucidations of this order for the dark places of Coleridge, Southey, Moore, Campbell, or Wilson; but, whenever the time comes, may they, each and all of them, be handled in the same truly careful, elaborate, and tasteful fashion which has won such universal approbation for the first edition of the "Life and Works" of the author of Childe Harold.

A hundred years and more passed before any attempt to do this sort and measure of justice to Dryden, to Pope, to Swift, to Addison - we need not say to Milton-was thought of for Spencer, or Shakespeare, or Ben Jonson, until the whole affair was hopeless: and if we would fairly appreciate the book, of which the eleventh volume is on our desk, we must ask ourselves one question :-- What would we not give for even a stray proof-sheet of such an edition of any of the great English classics of a century back? Compare it with the best edition that the most diligent research of the most able hand of a succeeding generation has been enabled to produce-and we shall at once be compelled to admit that the two things are not of the same genus. Take, for example, Sir Walter Scott's Dryden, and consider for a moment what a world of trouble has been expended, and with, comparatively speaking, how woful a blank for the result! Byron, in one of his humorous epistles addresses John Murray as the "Strahan, Tonson, Lintot, of our times:" alas! Strahan, Tonson, and Lintot, suffered their great authors to descend to the grave without even dreaming of embalming them in the style which the shrewd man of Albemarle Street has exemplified in the case of his hero, who being "dead, yet speaketh."

"In the contents of this volume," says the editor, "together with the fourth canto of 'Childe Harold,' the reader may trace the poetical, as well as personal, history of Lord Byron, from October 1816, when he left Switzerland, down to the beginning of 1820, by which time he had taken up his residence at Ravenna. It includes some example of almost every kind of poetical composition in which he excelled: among others, the first, and perhaps greatest, of his dramatic efforts, and the earliest specimen of his comic narrative.

The contents of the volume are indeed extremely various, and perhaps not one in the is an example: series will be considered as more interesting. Here are Manfred, the Lament of Tasso, Beppo, Mazeppa, the Ode on Venice, the Translation for the Morgante of Pulci, the Prophecy of Dante-and sixteen minor pieces, all occasional, that is to say, sprung from, and illustrative of, the personal feelings of the poet on incidents of his individual history. This is, in short, the political autobiography of Byron, from his residence among the Alps, down to his establishment domestic with Madame Guiccioli in Ravenna, A.D. 1820; and most truly and powerfully do the contents of the volume reflect all the "changes" that came over "the spirit of his dream" during this eventful period. The utter desolation of heart and feeling under which Byron had left England, and wandered over Switzerland, is the very soul of his Manfred: the reckless, care-me-devil reaction into which he plunged on reaching Venice, seems to be the inspiration, as to moralia, of Beppo: and in all the subsequent contents of the volume we have the Countess and solemn character, approaching to the very Guiccioli continually before us.

The cautious, delicate style of the editor's annotation may be exemplified in the following instance—one of the many we might cite on the pages of his Mazeppa.

Methinks it glides before me now, Methinks it glides before me now,

While he was highest of his line."

The note is simply and shortly, but sufficiently-

"The copy of Mazeppa sent to this country by Lord Byron, is in the handwriting of Theresa, Countess Guiccioli; and it is impossible not to suspect that the poet had some circumstances of his own personal history in his mind when he portrayed the fair Polish Theresa, her youthful lover, and the jealous rage of the old Count Palatine."

Manfred had the good fortune to be reviewed at the time by several of the ablest critics of the day in their best respective manners; and it is extremely interesting now to look back to and compare the several observations of such minds. Jeffrey is, we should say, always by far the neatest and cleverest; but there is a rich gusto about Wilson, that, however one may regret the laxity of his too fluent language, will always command a deeper admiration. Here

"There are three only, even among the great poets of modern times, who have chosen to depict, in their full shape and vigour, those agonies to which great and meditative intellects are, in the present progress of human history, exposed by the eternal recurrence of a deep and discontented scepticism. But there is only one who has dared to represent himself as the victim of those nameless and undefinable sufferings. Goethe chose for his doubts and his darkness the terrible disguise of the mysterious Faustus. Schiller, with still greater boldness, planted the same anguish in the restless, haughty, and heroic bosom of Wallenstein. But Byron has sought no external symbol in which to embody the inquietudes of his soul. He takes the world, and all that it inherit, for his arena and his spectators; and he displays himself before their gaze, wrestling unceasingly and ineffectually with the demon that torments him. At times, there is something mournful and depressing in his scepticism; but oftener it is of a high verge of a confiding faith. Whatever the poet may believe, we, his readers, always feel ourselves too much ennobled and elevated, even by his melancholy, not to be confirmed in our own belief by the very doubts so majestically conceived and uttered. His scepticism, if it ever approaches to a creed, carries with it its refutation in its grandeur. There is neither philosophy nor religion in those bitter and savage taunts which have been cruelly thrown out, from many quarters, against those moods of mind which are involuntary, and will not pass away; the shadows and spectres which still haunt his imagination may once have disturbed our own ;-through his gloom there are frequent flashes of illumination; -and the sublime sadness which to him is breathed from joined with a longing after immortality, and expressed in language that is itself divine. Compare this with Jeffrey.

"Manfred's worst fault, perhaps, is that it fatigues and overawes us by the uniformity of its terror and solemnity. Another, is the painful and offensive nature of the circumstance on which its distress is ultimately founded. The lyrical songs of the spirits are too long, and not all excellent. There is something of pedantry in them now and then; and even Manfred deals in classical allusions a little too much. If we were to consider it as a proper drama, or even as a finished poem, we should be obliged to add, that it is far too indistinct and unsatisfactory. But this we take to be according to the design and conception of the author. He contemplated but a dim and magnificent sketch of a subject which did not admit of more accurate drawing or more brilliant colouring. Its obscurity is a part of its grandeur ; and the darkness that rests upon it, and the smoky distance in which it is lost, are all devices to increase its majesty, to stimulate our curiosity, and to impress us with deeper awe.'

Mr. Gifford's condemnation of the original third act of Manfred, was, no doubt, on the whole, fortunate - the actual third act being much better than what it supplanted. in botching there is almost always something really good lost; and we were not aware till now that the discarded act had contained such a morocau as this song of Ashtaroth.

"The raven sits
On the raven-stone,"
And his black wing fits
O'er the milk-white bone:
To and fro, as the night-winds blow,
The carcass of the assassin swings;
And there alone, on the raven-stone,
The raven flaps his dusky wings.

The fetters creak — and his chon beak
Croaks to the close of the hollow sound;
And this is the tune, by the light of the moon,
To which the witches dance their round —
Merrily, merrily, cheerily, cheerily,
Merrily, speeds the ball:
The dead in their shrouds, and the demons in clouds,
Flock to the witches' carnival."

Byron's editor, collecting so diligently whatever other people have said as to the pieces under his cura, does not very often obtrude criticism of his own. Sometimes, however, he cannot tell, what he seems to consider as his proper business and concern, the history of a particular poem, without, in a certain degree, becoming its critic too: and we can sincerely say, that we wish he had in all instances felt himself called upon to make the same sort of exertion. In justice to him, not less than to the now neglected, but brilliantly clever Whistlecraft, we shall make a long quotation from the note editorial here prefixed to Beppo.
"Beppo was written at Venice, in October

1817, and acquired great popularity immediately on its publication in the May of the following year. Lord Byron's letters shew that he attached very little importance to it at the time. He was not aware that he had opened a new vein, in which his genius was destined to work out some of its brightest triumphs. 'I have written,' he says to Mr. Murray, 'a poem humorous, in or after the excellent man-ner of Mr. Whistlecraft, and founded on a Venetian anecdote which amused me. called Beppo - the short name for Giuseppo, that is, the Joe of the Italian Joseph. It has politics and ferocity.' Again — 'Whistlecraft is my immediate model, but Berni is the father of that kind of writing; which, I think, suits

* "Raven-stone (Rabenstein), a translation of the German word for the gibbet, which in Germany and Switzer-land is permanent, and made of stone." the mysteries of mortal existence, is always our language, too, very well. We shall see by this experiment. It will, at any rate, shew that I can write cheerfully, and repel the charge of monotony and mannerism. wished Mr. Murray to accept of Beppo as a free gift, or, as he chose to express it, 'as part of the contract for canto fourth of Childe Harold; adding, however, 'if it pleases, you shall have more in the same mood; for I know the Italian way of life, and, as for the verse and the passions, I have them still in tolerable vigour.' The Right Honourable John Hookham Frere has, then, by Lord Byron's confession, the merit of having first introduced the Bernesque style into our language; but his performance, entitled 'Prospectus and Specimen of an intended National Work, by William and Robert Whistlecraft, of Stowmarket, in Suffolk, harness and collar makers, intended to comprise the most interesting particulars relating to King Arthur and his round table,' though it delighted all elegant and learned readers, obtained at the time little notice from the public at large, and is already almost for-gotten. For the causes of this failure, about which Mr. Rose and others have written at some length, it appears needless to look further than the last sentence we have been quoting from the letters of the author of the more successful Beppo. Whistlecraft had the verse; it had also the humour, the wit, and even the poetry of the Italian model; but it wanted the life of actual manners, and the strength of stirring passions. Mr. Frere had forgot, or was, with all his genius, unfit to profit by remembering, that the poets whose style he was adopting always made their style appear a secondary matter. They never failed to em-broider their merriment on the texture of a really interesting story. Lord Byron perceived this; and avoiding his immediate master's one fatal error, and at least equalling him in the excellences which he did display, engaged at once the sympathy of readers of every class, and became substantially the founder of a new species of English poetry.'

In justice to Mr. Frere, however, whose "Specimen" has long been out of print, we

In justice to Mr. Frere, however, whose "Specimen" has long been out of print, we must take this opportunity of shewing how completely, as to style and versification, he had anticipated Beppo and Don Juan; though we can only find room for one of those little snatches of critical quizzing, which are perfect in their way. Take, for example, this goodhumoured parody on one of the most magnificent passages in Wordsworth:

"In castles and in courts Ambition dwells,
But not in castles or in courts alone;
She breathed a wish, throughout those sacred cells,
For bells of larger size, and louder tone;
Giants abominate the sound of bells,
And soon the flerce antipathy was shewn,
The tinkling and the jingling, and the clangor,
Roused their irrational, gigantic anger.

Meanwhile the solemn mountains that surrounded
The silent valley where the convent lay,
With tintinnabular uproar were astounded,
When the first peal burst forth at break of day:
Fceling their granite ears severely wounded,
They scarce knew what to think, or what to say;
And (though large mountains commonly conceal
Their sentiments, dissembling what they feel,

Yet) Cader-Gibbrish from his cloudy throne
To huge Loblommon gave an intimation
Of this strange rumour, with an awful tone,
Thund'ring his deep surprise and indignation;
The lesser hills, in language of their own,
Discuss'd the topic by reverberation;
Discoursing with their echoes all day long,
Their only conversation was, 'ding-dong.'"

Considering the almost utter oblivion into which the admirable Whistlecraft has sunk, we cannot but applaud the candid liberality of Byron's editor, in immortalising, we may say, the merits of Mr. Frere on this occasion. If we had room for further extracts, Ugo Foscolo's beautiful remarks on the Morgante Maggiore would have been drawn upon with not less boldness. As it is, we must dismiss this volume with our best thanks to all concerned, not forgetting Mr. Turner, whose exquisite views of the Bridge of Sighs at Venice, and the Bernese Alps, form its engraved embellishments. This great artist, unlike the minors of his race, finds time for every thing; and amidst the, as one would suppose, all-engrossing demands of his more serious avocations, contrives to throw out, without difficulty, such little gems as these_as worthy, to be sure, as any things can be of his high genius-by the dozen; just as Byron himself jotted down carelessly in diaries, thoughts which would have made the fortune of any ordinary poet; or as Scott, in the heyday of his coining, (as the Edinburgh writers to the Signet called his novel-making), had always leisure for private letters, sufficient, if he had indited nothing besides, to give him an eminent place among the masters of wit, humour, sagacity, and eloquence.

The Geographical Annual for 1833. 12mo. London, Bull.

INTO this signally neat and convenient cabinet atlas the latest discoveries and changes in geographical science have been introduced; so that, although it is on a small scale, the quantity and the character of the intelligence it contains for reference can hardly be surpassed. It is altogether an extremely useful and admirable compendium.

The Biblical Annual. Idem.

This is a similar production for the illustration of Bible history, both as connected with the ancient and the modern world. A copious index adds to its utility; and for what it professes to do, it is quite equal in merit to its foregoing companion, and deserves a like measure of public favour. The two volumes form a family treasure.

Complete Election Guide, &c. &c. By George Price, Esq. Barrister-at-Law. 12mo. pp. 294. London, 1832. Rideway.

London, 1832. Ridgway.

The reform act, here given with ample dissection and references, having greatly altered the practice of elections, the country is much indebted to the able elucidation of the subject in this volume, which certainly, as far as the law is now understood, is what it purports to be, and an admirable guide both to candidates and electors.

Lafayette, Louis Philippe, and the Revolution of 1830; or, History of the Events and the Men of July. By B. Sarrans, jun. 2 vols. 12mo. Translated from the French. London, 1832. Wilson.

This is another translation of a work of much party interest, and of the general character of which we have already given our opinion. It is therefore unnecessary for us to go over the ground again. The friends of Lafayette, and those who espouse the same side of the cause, will, of course, be much gratified by the publication; which also possesses the farther recommendation of making us acquainted with the conflicting elements which still threaten the tranquillity of France. The English of the work is not over clearly executed: we read, for example, "Nothing could exceed the rhagnificance of Lafayette's reception at Lyons, that second city of the kingdom, which, forty-four years before, had hailed within its walls the youthful glory of the defender of American liberty, on beholding him again, in the decline of a career full of conflicts, of glory, and, above all, of honour:"—than which, except in these volumes, we have seldom met with more complicated construction.

We observe, from a circular, that the two rival publishers of this work have fallen out upon the subject; but non nostrúm tantas componere lites.

The K'Haunie Kineh-Walla, or Eastern Story-Teller. A Collection of Eastern Tales. By John Shipp, author of the "Memoirs," and the "Military Bijou." London, 1832. Longman and Co.

A VERY amusing and characteristic little volume; we recommend it as a pleasant Christmas present. The "Foresters of Nepaul" is a wild but interesting story; and there is a portrait of the industrious and intelligent author.

Kidd's Picturesque Pocket Companion: Guide to Hastings. With Views by Bonner. Pp. 70. London, 1832. Gilbert.

ONE of the neat little local guides which are being brought out in this fashion, very prettily illustrated with wood-cuts, and very convenient for visitors to this watering-place.

The History of Ireland, from the earliest Period to the present Time. By John Lawless, Esq. 8vo. Parts I. and II. London, 1832. Ridgway; Wilson; Strange.

As only sixpence-worth, or thirty-two pages of Mr. Lawless's history have yet appeared, we can give no opinion upon it, except that in its view of the early traditions and chronicles of the country it takes the side most favourable to the ancient fame of Ireland. When we descend to less remote and less fabulous times, we shall be better able to judge of the author's powers.

Deptford.

J. T. BARKER.

THE Astronomische Nachrichten give the observations on Encke's comet, made by Mr. F. Mossotti at Buenos Ayres, on the 2d and 6th of June last. On the first day, he says, the comet appeared like a nebula of very small diameter without a nucleus, and very faint, which Mr. M. thought might perhaps be owing to the humidity of the atmosphere over the river. It was not till the 6th that the weather cleared up, but Mr. M., to his great surprise, found the comet so faint at half-past six A.M., that it was scarcely discernible with one of Dollond's three-feet telescopes; and more than an hour before sunrise, it had quite vanished. Mr. H. C. Droerhagen, in a letter to Dr. Olbers, likewise the 6th of June, adds, that Mr. M. compared it to a star of the seventh or eighth magnitude; and though the weather was clearer than when he made his first observation, the comet had become so much fainter, that he almost feared he should not be able to make another; and Dr. Olbers says, that from the present faintness and decreased size of this comet, it is hardly possible to help thinking that it must have undergone some physical changes. If it is so weak this year in the perigee, we need not wonder that it was looked for in vain in Europe in the perihelion.

WAX CANDLES.

FROM celestial luminaries we aptly descend to terrestrial lights. Several months have elapsed since we called the attention of our readers to what appeared to us a most important improvement in the manufacture of wax caudles, by a discovery of the process of moulding them; and we have since frequently expressed both surprise and regret that any want of perseverance should have occasioned the relinquishment of so promising a benefit both to the public and the ingenious inventor.

It seems, however, that Dr. Bulkeley, the patentee, not being fully satisfied with the result of his first experiments, has, in the interim, been laboriously and sedulously engaged in a fresh course, of which the details, did our space admit, would afford much to entertain as well as instruct. It must suffice to say, that the Dr. has dissected, and examined with the minutest accuracy, the candles of every known manufacturer in or near the metropolis; that for three months he has nightly burned, and nightly watched, from twenty to thirty of these candles, for the purposes of comparison; and that by such, and other means, he has succeeded in producing an article which, upon trial, we can truly declare, for brilliancy of light, pureness of material, and beauty of form, to be hitherto unequalled. The most manifest improvement the Dr. has achieved beyond his first essay, is in the wick, which is con-thereby consume itself. Another great advantage to the public, without mentioning the reduction in price, is, the less liability to fraud; as the composition, by the process of moulding, is homogeneous, while the common wax candle is almost invariably of inferior material nearest to the wick.

Extract from a Letter to Baron Humboldt, Berlin, from M. Bonpland.

Buenos Avres, June 10, 1832.

"I EMBRACE the opportunity of the sailing of a vessel to send you the good news that my collections from Paraguay, and the Portuguese missions, will be here in a few days. The herbal and the collection of rocks, accompanied with circumstantial particulars on the position of the strata, will, I hope, prove interesting to the professors of the Museum, to whom I shall immediately send them.

"By the same vessel I write to the minister of foreign affairs, thanking him for the orders he has given to the consul-general of Buenos Ayres to facilitate my return to Europe. I have informed the minister of my motives for wishing to remain here some time longer, for the promotion of the sciences. I wish to collect new materials, and recover those which I have unfortunately lost.

"I hope shortly to send down the Uraguay a beautiful collection of living plants, which will furnish the Museum with numerous shrubs of the make, or Paraguay tea, which may be cultivated in our colony of Algiers. I know that the Province of the Missions has been visited by able botanists, M. A. St. Hilaire, and my countryman M. Sellon; but there is still something to glean after those enlightened and zealous travellers. M. Sellon has discovered on the banks of the Arapey, in the Banda Oriental, enormous remains of the megatherium, which is generally believed here to be an armadillo dasypus.

"I send to-day a second remittance of very fresh seeds to the Museum, and have written to M. Bosc about this parcel, as I did respecting that which I sent from San Borja in June 1831. I believe that there were 140 species. Since my restoration to liberty, I have been stuffing all the rare birds I could procure. I intend to engage a skilful bird-stuffer to accompany me to the Pampas, where I shall hunt the viscachas, which, I believe, are scarce, and the anatomy of which will be very interesting.'

M. Bonpland mentions the appearance of Encke's comet on the 2d of June, which was still visible on the 10th, and had traversed the constellation of Eridanus. Baron Humboldt. in a note, states, that his countryman, M. Sellon, who had formed a most beautiful collection, had been unfortunately drowned in October 1831, in the Rio San Francisco.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

THAT highly respectable journal, the Allgemeine Zeitung, has the following as an article of correspondence:

Rome, October 9th.

The news of the death of Sir Walter Scott has caused a great sensation in Italy, where his works are so generally read, and which he has so lately visited. The Journal des Debats, of the 28th September, denies that he left two unpublished novels, "Pizarro," and the "Cross of Malta." The Journal des Debats is mistaken on this point. These works were really

This was the last work of the great author. I guarantee this as a fact: for Sir Walter Scott spoke to me about the first work during his stay in Rome. He said that he had sent it to England, where it had only to be revised for the press. He said, that from his boyhood the Maltese knights had so interested him, that after he had visited the island, the book, as it were, composed itself. Sir Walter was engaged on the tale Pizarro while he was at Rome: I several times found him writing, and have had the manuscript in my hands. The honoured author presented it to me beforehand, promising to send it me from England as soon as he had made it ready for the press. The fit which Sir Walter had on his journey home, his sickness, or death, probably hindered him from putting the last hand to these two works; and I cannot know whether there is any likelihood of their being printed.

Windsor Castle. Drawn by W. Daniell, Esq. R.A.; engraved by J. C. Armytage.

ONE of the illustrations of the forthcoming Number of the Court Magazine. The subject we spoke of when we mentioned Mr. Daniell's large and beautiful views of Windsor, published last year. The present engraving is an exquisite piece of art; it has all the clearness of line, and all the mellowness of mezzotinto.

The Banks of the Loire. A Series of Views.

By Louis Parez. Part II. Ackermann. THE second part of M. Parez' picturesque work is entitled to quite as favourable a notice as that which we took of the first. Its contents are: —a portion of the magnificent exterior of the "Château de Blois;" the ancient town of "Montrichard; the "Château de Cheronmontained; the Content of Cheron-ceaux," the most curious and admirable monu-ment of the middle ages in the department in which it stands; the "Pont des Traies, at Angers;" a vignette of "Fontevrault;" and a

The typographical illustrations abound with interesting matter. Who can help shuddering at the following description of the prison of the unfortunate Cardinal de Guise, in the Château de Blois?

"It has a heavy iron door, communicating with the castle, and another into the town, and is illumined by a solitary narrow aperture in its massive wall. In the middle of this dungeon are the remains of an oubliette, underneath which was a deep pit, furnished with an iron machine, having two wheels armed with sharp Here the wretched victims, whose hands were tied behind them, met death in its most horrible form, their bodies being literally torn to pieces by the force of the machine, and thence thrown into another pit, filled with quick lime, where the mutilated remains were speedily consumed."

Roberts, are two of the most striking. The following letter from Sir Walter Scott, of which following letter from Sir water Scott, or which a fac-simile appears in the seventh part, is interesting in itself, and also as shewing the opinion entertained by that illustrious and lamented man, of an early portion of the work under our notice.

"SIR,—I have very ungraciously left unacknowledged your present of the Landscape Illustrations of Waverley. I pretend to no knowledge of art, so my opinion ought to go for nothing; but I think they are very beautiful, and sincerely hope they will answer the purpose of the artists and publishers. I remain, sir, your obliged humble servant.

Timour's Death-bed. By William Kennedy.

"Ungird the saddle from his back,
And set my war-steed free—
No more to slaughter or the sack
Shall he be urged by me!
Our circle in the field is run,
Quick comes a long release—
The prophet calls his faithful son,
Cathay may rest in peace!"
Thus spake in his tent, midst his mighty ones lying, Timour Beg, the world's master, whose great soul was figing.

"My wives, my sons, my chiefs, draw near!
Draw near, but not to weep—
Some fleeting hours you linger here,
While with my sires I sleep.
Time-bowed, and bettle-shaken now,
Ere claims the dust its own,
I'd tell the heir of empires how Rose Timour to his throne"—
Then all, with hush'd lips, 'round the royal couch gather,
And Prince Jehaungeer bendeth low to his father.

"The Melakus forced we force was horse."

"The Uzbeks forced me from my home

"The Usbeks forced me from my home
Some forty years ago.

The fallen find where'er they roam
Few friends and many a foe:
And I was fallen—comrades seven,
With my dear wife Alzai,
Were all that cleaved to me when driven
From my loved land away!
Save one—the just Allah I whose sun, every morrow,
Showers gifts that make gladsome the dull track of sorrow.

Showers gifts that make gladsome the dull track of sorrow.

In the Kharismian waste, at night,
Encamped beside a well,
Three of my band in sudden flight,
Off from my fortunes fell;
Those knaves of Khorassaun despaired
Of Timour's waning star,
And reckless how the exile fared,
They turned their reins afar—
'Tis thus, in life's tempest, the baseness we cherish
Gives its back to the storm-cloud, and leaves us to perish.

Gives its back to the storm-cloud, and leaves us to perian.

A friend! ay true, I had a friend,

To win me to remain—

What did the bosom-brother lend?

A dungeon-vault and chain!

Braving the worst, I snatched a sword,

And burstieg through the guard,

I asked that hospitable lord,

If such were my reward?

Then shame moved the breast of the chief fickle-hearted,

And he said, "Go in peace?" so the captive departed.

And he said, 'Go in peace i' so the captive departed.

I went in peace—small cause to fear,
For wolfish men had I,
The robber spares the lone fakeer
Whose pleasure-cup is dry.
The arrow from the Thunderer's how
The blast that shakes the sea,
Strikes not the peasant's dwelling low,
Rends not th' up-rosted tree.
Though no hand held to Timour the morsel he needed,
Ris way in the desert was safe and unbeeded.

Now list, Prince Jehaungeer, list all—
Upon a hill I stood
At midnight, and began to call
On God, in humble mood—
'Do with him as thou wilt,' I cried,
'Thy creature of the dust
Forsakes his dreams of earthly pride,
To Thee confines his trust;'
Soft smiles seemed to lighten the dim face of heaven,
And sleep to the eye of the watcher was given.

Again I felt awake—a voice Swelled solemn in mine ear; It said, 'O Munsour's son, rejoice! Blest is the prayer sincese;

On, on! the lights that live on high
Salute thee with a sign,
That honour, power, and victory,
Are henceforth to be thine!'
The voice died away and the bright stars shone brighter,
While a grief-burthened spirit grew lighter and lighter.

I swam the Jihon on the morn— That Tartar stream is strong;

That Tartar stream is strong;
Yet, buoyant, as young Hope, was borne Lame Timour's frame along.
The 'voice' had stirred my soul, Ameers,
With danger-daring fire,
And earth seem'd won, when seventy spears
Hailed me their battle-sire!
The fugitive's banner by men was surrounded,
Whose hearts in their hands were when War's trumpet sounded.

The followed by Darie to the fore

what followed?—Ruin to the foe
That held my lands in thrail—
To trait'rous kindred, overthrow—
To true hearts triumph all.
The winds of desolation swept,
Like chaf, dark hate's array,
And soon the wandering outcast kept
Sole rule o'er Zagata!
And day after day, his dominion extended,
And his soul blessed the Lord, who his servant befriended.
My gray haired converdes 'round the helm.

And his soul blessed the Lord, who his servant Decreased
My gray-haired comrades 'round the bed—
Your lion-looks to me
Are tablets stern, of scenes long sped—
Of strife and victory.
Where Indus rolls his mighty course,

To deal on the faithless the judgment of Heaven.

Angel of Death! thy dusky wings
Fling their chill shadows near;
The realms of seven-and-twenty kings
I yield to Jehaungeer.

Spotless the robe of empire wear,
My son. Now, Ameers brave!
Swear fealty to the Khaun,—then bear

Timour Beg speaks no more; and his people, who gath
All pale, round his tent, call in vain on their father.

The Isles of the Son Fairies. By Mary Howitt.

Among the isles of the golden mist I lived for many a year, And all that chanced unto me there 'Tis well that ye should hear.

I dwelt in a hall of silvery pearl, With minbow light inlaid; I sat on a throne as old as the sea, Of the ruby coral made.

The old carbuncle lit the dome
Where I was sworn a king;
And my crown was wrought of the pale sea gold,
And so was my fairy ring.

And she who was set on my right hand, As the morning star was fair; She was clothed in a robe of shadowy light, And veiled by her golden hair.

They made me king of the Fairy Isles That lie in the golden mist, Where the coral rocks and the silvery sand By singing waves are kissed.

Far off, in the ocean solitudes, They lie—a glorious seven! Like a beautiful group of sister stars In the untraced heights of heaven.

For the mariner sails them round about, But he comes not them anigh; They are hid far off in a secret place Of the sea's immensity.

O beautiful isles! where there comes no death, Where no winter enters in, And their fairy race, like the lily flowers, Do neither toil nor spin!

O beautiful isles! where the coral rocks
Like an ancient temple stand,
Like a temple of wondrous workmanship
For a lotty worship planned!

The heights of heaven do roof it in, O'erspanned like an azure bow; And its floor is the living waves of light, That cover the depths below.

The unsumed depths of the ancient sea, Where the emerald caverns lie, Where an earlier race of the fairy kings Made their great treasury.

O beautiful isles! when the waning moon Sinks down from the vales of earth, She rises upon those fairy seas, And gives to their daylight birth.

And gives to their daylight firth.
There comes no cloud to dim her rays,
She shines forth pure and bright;
The silver moon she shines by day,
And the golden mist by night.
O beautiful isles! and a fairy race,
As the dream of a poet fair,
Now hold the place by a charmed spell
That has power o'er sea and air.
This has the present of the large possible.

Their hoats are made of the large pearl-shell
That the waters cast to land,
With carved prows more richly wrought
Than the work of mortal hand.

They skim along the silver waves
Without or sail or oar;
Wherever the fairy voyager would,
The pearl ship comes to shore.

They taught me the song which is their speech, A tone of love divine: They sat me down at their banquet board, And poured me out fairy wine.

The wine of the old sea vintage red, That was made long years ago,
More rich than the blood in kingly veins,
Yet pure and cool as snow.

I loved that idle life for a time, But when that time was by, I pined again for another change, And for human sympathy.

They brought me then a glorious form, And gave her for my bride; I looked on her, and I straight forgot That I was to earth allied.

I matched the crown they offered ma-I forgot what I had been; I snatched the crown to be a king, That she might be a queen.

For many a year and more I dwelt In those isles of soft delight, Where all was kind and beautiful, With neither death nor night.

We danced on the sands when the silver moon Through the coral arches gleamed, And pathways broad of glittering light O'er the asure waters streamed.

Then shot forth many a pearly boat,
Like stars across the sea;
And songs were sung, and shells were blown,
That set wild music free.

For many a year and more I dwelt With neither thought nor care, Till I forgot almost my speech, Forgot both creed and prayer.

At length it chanced that as my boat Went on its charmed way,
I came unto the veil of mist
Which round the Seven Isles lay.

Even then it was a sabbath morn, And a ship was passing by, And I heard a hundred voices raise A sound of psalmody.

A mighty love came o'er my heart, A yearning toward my kind, And unwillingly I spoke aloud The impulse of my mind.

O take me hence, ye Christian men!'
I cried, in spiritual want,
And anon the golden mist gave way,
That had been like adamant.

The little boat wherein I sat Seemed all to melt away; And I was left upon the sea, Like Peter, in dismay.

Those Christian mariners, amazed, Looked on me in affright; Some cried I was an evil ghost, And some a water-sprite!

But the chaplain seized the vessel's boat, With mercy prompt and boon, And took me up into the ship, As I fell into a swoon.

As one that in delirlous dreams
Strange things doth hear and see—
So passed before my mind the shapes
Of this bright heresy.

In vain I told the mariners, No man to me would list; They jested at the fairy isles, And at the golden mist.

They swore I was a shipwrecked man, Tossed on the dreary main; and pitled me, because my fate Had crazed my 'wildered brain. At length, when I perceived how dull The minds of men had grown, locked these things within my soul, For my own thought alone.

For my own thought alone.
And soon a wondrous thing I saw;
I now was old and gray,
A man of three score years and ten,
A weak man in decay.
And yesterday, and I was young!
Time did not leave a trace
Upon my form, while I abode
Within the charmed place.

I trembled at the fearful work
Of three score years and ten;
I asked for love—but I had grown
An alien among men.

I passed among the busy crowds;
I marked their care and pain,
And how they waste their manhood's strength,
To make but little gain.

I saw besotted men mistake
For gold, unworthy clay;
And many more, who sell their souls
For the pleasures of a day.

I saw how years on years roll on,
As a tale that has been told;
And then at last they start, like me,
To find that they are old.

at o near they are out.

Said 1, "These men laugh me to scorn,
My wisdom they resist;
But they themselves abide, like me,
Within a golden mist!"

Oh up, and save yourselves! even now
The ship goes hurrying by,
And I hear the hymn of the souls redeemed,
Who are bound for eternity!

The Wonders of the Lane.

By the Author of "Corn-Law Rhymes."

Strong climber of the mountain's side,
Though thou the vale disdain,
Yet walk with me where hawthorms hide
The wonders of the lane.

High o'er the rushy springs of Don
The stormy gloom is rolled;
The moorland hath not yet put on
His purple, green, and gold.
But here the titling spreads his wing,
Where dewy daisies gleam;
And here the sunflower of the spring
Burns bright in morning's beam.
To mountain winds the famished fox,
Complains that Sol is alow,
O'er headlong steeps and gushing rocks
His royal robe to throw.

But here the lisard seeks the sun,
Here colls, in light, the snake;
And here the fire-tuft hath begun
Its beauteous nest to make.
On! then, while hums the earliest bee
Where verdure fires the plain,
Walk thou with me, and stoop to see
The glories of the lane!
For, oh! I love these banks of rock,
This roof of sky and tree,
These tufts, where steeps the gloaming clock,
And wakes the earliest bee!
As spirits from eternal day
Look down on earth, secure,
Look here, and wonder, and survey
A world in ministure:

World not scorned by Him who made
E'en weakness by his might;
But solemn in his depth of shade,
And splendid in his light.
Light!—not alone on clouds afar,
O'er storm-loved mountains spread,
O'r widely teaching sun and star,
Thy glorious thoughts are read;
Oh, no! thou art a wondrous book,
To sky, and sea, and land,
A page on which the angels look,
Which sheets understand!
And here, O light! minutely fair,
Divinely plain and clear,
Thy bright small hand is here!
You drop-fed lake, six inches wide,
Is Huron, glrt with wood;
This driplet feeds Missouri's tide—
And that, Niagara's flood.
What tidings from the Andes brings
Yon line of liquid light,
That down from heaven in madness flings
The blind foam of its might?
To lot hear his thunder roll,
The roar that ne'er is still!

What forests tall of thisest moss
Clothe every little stone!

What pigmy oaks their foliage toss
O'er pigmy valleys lone!
With shade o'er shade, from ledge to ledge,
Ambitious of the sky,
They feather o'er the steepest edge
Of mountains mushroom-high.
Oh, God of marvels! who can tell
What myriad living things
On these gray stones unseen may dwell!
What mations, with their kings!
I feel no shock, I hear no groan,
While fate, perchance, o'erwhelms
Empires on this subverted stone,
A hundred ruined realms!
Lo! in that dot, some mite, like me,
Impelled by wo or whim,
May crawl, some atom's cliffs to see,
A tiny world to him!
Lo! while he pauses, and admres
The works of nature's might,
Spurned by my foot, his world expires,
And all to him is night!
Oh, God of terrors! what are we?
Poor infsects sparked with thought!
Thy whisper, Lord, a word from thee,
Could smite us into nought!
But should'st thou wreck our father-land,
And mix it with the deep,
Safe in the hollow of thy hand
Thy little one will sleep.

DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

On Monday the play of Kenilworth was revived at this theatre, with the characters very effectively supported. Miss Phillips as Elizabeth was every inch the queen; and her haughty speech and abrupt action agreed admirably with the look of that imperious sovereign. Amy Robsart had in Mrs. Nesbitt a representative equally beautiful, natural, and pathetic; and Miss Kenneth as the faithful Janet Foster filled the trio of the principal female parts in a manner to delight the audience. The other sex was also ably cast: Cooper was excellent in Leicester, and Stanley no less so in Tressilian; while Younge, Mathews, Harley, and Bedford, did ample justice to Varney, Antony Foster, Wayland Smith, and Michael Lambourne. The house was full, and the performances much applauded. The Commemoration, still replete with attraction, and Massaniello, followed, completing an evening of varied and most agreeable entertainment.

COVENT GARDEN.

Waverley, a play founded on the novel of that name, by Mr. Calcraft, the Dublin manager—and not hitherto performed in London, though it has been in Edinburgh and Dublin—was produced here on Monday. The story of Waverley is essentially undramatic; and therefore might be recently as a factor of the control fore, with the exception of a few striking and well-acted scenes, we found it drag heavily along upon the stage, during its endurance for three hours and a half. The relief of a ball at Holyrood House was so welcome, that it was encored. The principal characters was a well gustained as the inequivolence. ters were as well sustained as the inaptitude of the actors at the northern Doric dialect After the play, "a Masque in honour of the genius of the Minstrel of the North," written by Mr. Sheridan Knowles, was got up with great beauty and splendour. Of the poetical portion of the work we cannot say much from hearing it recited on the stage; but it rather surprised us in parts by the odd expressions used, than afforded us the idea of superior merit. Mr.

The Masque has since been published by Mr. Moxon, and only reaches the mediocre character of a hurried com-position, got up for an occasion. The Bard calls himself

Knowles, the author, opened the scene by declaiming, as a Bard, some verses addressed to the tomb of Scott; after which he invokes Fancy (Miss Sidney), the Genius of Scotland (Miss E. Tree), the Spirit of the Mountains (Miss Shirreff), the Genius of Scotlish Song (Miss Inversity), and Immortality (Miss Tayllar) to calebrate the fame of the departed. lor), to celebrate the fame of the departed. Meanwhile he lies down to sleep upon a bank, and the imaginary beings hold a colloquy, in which the posthumous glory of the minstrel is recorded. This takes place in Dryburgh Ab-bey, of which one of the most magnificent views ever painted for a theatre is given : and the Messrs. Grieve have with no less skill and taste produced the scenery, in which succeeding tableaux vivans from the works of Scott are vividly and admirably represented, with appropriate action, in the following order:—

Nothing can exceed the splendour and exquisite effect of these scenes, which mingle the grand and touching in the dramatis persona with the superb and charming in art, in a style which must be seen to be appreciated and felt. The whole closes with a jubilee, in which

"a brother" of the immortal Minstrel of the North, who,

e says—

"Repaid his mother-land his happy birth;

For thou didst sing her so, that other lands,
Drawn with the wonders thou didst tell of her,
Did come themselves to see her!"

Did come themselves to see her!"

The epithet "fair claymore;" the phrases, "for oft begullement;" "She knew him well as shou—lements as well;" "lusty birth," applied to the creations of fancy; and "radiant with intellectuality,"—are only instances of imperfections too numerous in so short a production. Nor is the following ill-expressed bull any better:—

"Behold the pile wherein they laid thee in Thy mortal sleep—"tis levelled with the dust;"
and consequently not years easy to behold.

and consequently not very easy to behold.

all the characters reappear and are grouped with many others at Abbotsford, which is seen in ruins, as if centuries had elapsed—the effect of which is surpassing. As a spectacle, we have never witnessed any thing finer upon any stage.

On Wednesday the play was much shortened, and was all the better in four acts; and it was improved in other respects, so as to diminish its tedium. The drunken scene was most spiritedly enacted; and Abbott, in particular, won himself a bacchanalian crown of the greenest ivy. The Holyrood Palace and ball scene were also still more effective, both as regards admirable scenery and clever acting. Miss Shirreff, by her sweet warbling of Scottish song, more than earned her universal encore. The Masque scenery went off with increased éclat.

ADELPHI.

On Monday a new piece, from the pen of Mr. Beazley, entitled the Divorce, was brought out at this house, and, as if agreeable to the wish we expressed in our last No., gave us the satisfaction of seeing Mrs. Yates again on these boards, where her entrance was hailed by longcontinued plaudits. The plot is of that perilous kind which it is difficult, if not impossible, to dramatise without risk of offence. A Ladu Clifford (Mrs. Yates) obtains a divorce from her Lord (Clifford, Mr. Yates), on the score of incompatibility of disposition, and unites herself to the object of her early love, De Merville, Mr. Hemmings. They are found at a foreign Spa, where the detection of their secret, their repudiation by more select society, and the generosity of the deserted husband, cover them with shame and misery. In the end the poor lady falls between the two stools; both past and present husband fly from her in despair, and she sinks under the accumulation of disappointment and misfortune, not finding the world well lost, though all is sacrificed for love. The catastrophe is well wrought up, and, but for the objectionable nature of the story itself, a lesson which is far more fit to be read than to be personated, we would commend alike the talent of the author and the excellence of the acting. Mrs. Yates performed with all her wonted feeling; and Yates, in Lord Clifford, was even more than usually successful. Mr. Hemmings also acquitted himself ably in De Merville. The main incident was heightened, as well as lightened, by Buckstone, the keeps of the best level with the state of the s the keeper of the hotel, and his pretty levity of a wife, Mrs. Honey; whose separableness (to coin a word) was a severe trial of the De Mervilles. Reeve had an original character, a waterhunter; i. e. an eccentric, who runs over all the Spas of Europe, and, without being ill, drinks deep at all their wells. It is a very whimsical part, and often excited laughter.

OLYMPIC.

The Court of Queen's Bench is a happy title for the new burletta at this prosperous theatre, where such a dramatic queen as the fair Vestris reigns, surrounded by such a court of female beauty. It is a burlesque taken from the Urgella Maga of Casti, or more probably from its copy the Ce qui plait aux Dames of Voltaire; as, we understand, is also the Doom Kiss forthcoming at Drury Lane. In this dramatic knight called Sir Lionel, pro Roberto, (Mr. J. Vining) ravishes a kiss from the fairy queen Rose (Vestris), disguised as a peasant girl selling flowers, and not, as in the original, having butter to spoil, and eggs to break in the struggle. His horse having absconded with the whole of his riches, twenty crowns, he is unable to satisfy the offended damsel; and being cited before Bertha (Eudora in the bills, Miss Gliddon), the Queen of Dagobert, is tried by a court of love, and condemned to die, unless he can tell within a certain period what it is that all women like best. In his utter extremity, the secret is revealed to him by an old hag, on condition that he will do whatever she desires in return. He meets the reassembled court, and answers the question that "Every woman likes best to have her own will;" and is, of course, acquitted. But then comes the old crone, and claims him as her husband; after much nausea he redeems his knightly faith by marrying her, and out of gratitude consents to fulfil his conjugal pledge. The old lady immediately turns out to be the lovely fairy queen; and they are as happy as happy can be.

Such is the outline of this little brilliant piece, sustained by splendid dresses and scenery, by very sweet music by John Barnett, and by charming acting and singing by Mad. Vestris, Miss Murray, and the rest. A humorous squire is also appended to the knight, and very cleverly personated by Mr. Cooper, who frequently reminded us of the quaintness of Mun-den. We need hardly say that the burletta is already extremely popular: indeed one of the scenes is enough to make it so, viz. that in which all the nymphs of the Olympic appear in counsellors' gowns and wigs, to try the cause of the defendant knight. This is truly laughable, though we could scarcely penetrate the disguises so well as to be able to tell who were the learned persons that furnished so much amusement. We almost venture to name Tulip, in which Miss Murray looked prettier than ever; Fusia, Miss Fitzwalter; Wallflower, Mrs. Bland; Lily of the Valley, Miss Crawford-but we are wrong in particularising where both personal attrac-tion and talent were so generally shared, as to render distinction invidious. The pleadings and wrangling of the bar were done with all the ludicrous force of parody.

As the same origin is assigned to the production at a larger theatre, it may please those of our readers attached to the belles lettres to recall to their memory some passages from the Italian and French poets to whom we have alluded. They will recollect the delicious versification of Casti, and the simple humour with which Dagobert refers the matter at issue to his queen.

"E corre a darne parte a Dagoberto, Avanti a cui la sua querela espone:
Qualmente un certo giovinastro, esperto
Seduttor delle semplici persone,
Il di cui nome sente esser Roberto,
Le ha fatta una cotal sporca azione,
Lei forsando onestissima fanciulla;
Le ha rotte l'uova, e non le ha dato nulla.
Il saggio Prence a Martuccia rispose:
Qui si tratta di stupro a quel che lo sento;
Ite a Berta mia mogile: ella in tai cose
Ha molta esperienza e serrimento;
Berta ha maniere affabili, amorose,
E faravvi cortese aocoglimento.
Pol disse a i suoi Baron: non è così?
E tutti replicaron: Maestà si."

The luscious warmth of the Italian's descriptions (which we do not quote*) are converted into more pungent satire by the wit of Voltaire, who tells us of the knight:

"Il voyagea devers Rome la sainte,
Qui surpassait la Rome des Césars;
Il rapportait de son auguste enceinte,
Non des lauriers cueillis aux champs de Mars,
Mais des agnus avec des indulgences,
Et des pardons, et de belles dispenses;
Mon chevalier en était tout chargé,
D'argent fort peu; car dans ces temps de crise
Tout paladin fut très mai partagé;
L'argent n'aliait qu'aux mains des gens d'église."

He makes Marthon (the peasant girl) claim the twenty crowns promised her in a more degrading style.

"Enfin Marthon, rajustant sa coiffure, Dit a Robert: Où sont mes vingt écus? Le chevaller, tout pantois et confus, Cherchant en vain sa bourse et sa monture, Veut s'excuser: nulle excuse ne sert; Marthon ne peut digérer son injure, Et va porter sa plainite à Dagobert: Un chevalier, dit-elle, m'a pillée, Et violée, et sur-tout point payée. Le sage prince à Marthon repondit: C'est de viol que je vois qu'il s'agit; Allez plaider devant ma femme Berthe; En tel procès la reine est très experte: Benignement elle vous recevra, Et sans délai justice se fera."

The rest of the narrative is as closely similar; but we will see what is made of it next Monday before we go any farther—if we do then, considering that in Chaucer's Wife of Bath's Tale another more ready English illustration may be found.

STRAND THEATRE.

HERE we have also, in the Female Cavaliers, a piece originally Spanish, but we suppose taken from the nearer French stage. We recognise in it Cervantes' Novella de las dos Doncellas; and we think it might have furnished a superior drama. It is, however, very piquant and entertaining.

VARIETIES.

Tempest at Naples.—A dreadful storm, accompanied by some remarkable phenomena, occurred in the province of Otranto on the 10th ultimo. A deluge of rain fell, mingled with great hailstones; and a whirlwind, about three hundred paces in width, ravaged the country in a stripe of fifteen or sixteen miles in extent, uprooting the olive-trees, and damaging and destroying houses, including those of Diso and Otranto, till it reached the Adriatic sea. A number of persons were killed and hurt.

A number of persons were kined and nurte Agricultural Meeting: Highland Society.— The Kelso Mail newspaper contains a long and animated account of a great meeting at Kelso,

"E si vide apparir vecchia canuta,
Che il mento a vea schiacciato, e il naso aguzzo,
L'occhio sanguigno, e la palpebra irsuta,
E lungo e secco il collo al par di un struszo;
Grinzosa in faccia, e nelle spalle ossuta,
Zoppa, curva, schentata, e lungi il puzzo
Dalle schifose sue carni esalava,
E dalla bocca uscia sordida bava.
Dal petto si vedean nudo e scabbloso
Due zinnacce cader rugose e flosce,
E un giubboncello sudicio e cencioso
A meta le copria le nere cosce;
E appoggiando a un bastone il piè dubbioso,
Moveva il passo con affanni e angosce;
In veder la bruttissima figura,
Roberto ebbe a morir dalla paura."

† And in still more modern verse by Dryden, where Arthur of the round table and his queen Genevra are the sovereign authorities; and the moral concludes by advising all maids to have fresh husbands to rule, and

"Wid was to wed as often as they can, And in each change to get a better man." The point is also maintained in the epigram, where the dame says to her spouse,

"My own sweet Will, how dearly do I love thee; And ne'er was woman yet, or good or ill, But dearly, dearly loved her own sweet Will."

And they will have it too, by wheedling, or fighting, or persevering, or teasing, or by force, or by treachery, or by fondness, or by some means or other. So it is better for men to yield at once.

^{*} They seem to accommodate matters equally dramatically, and more socially, in Nottinghamshire—if we may judge from the annexed paragraph:—"There is now living at Sandiacre a woman who has married two husbands: they both live in the same village, and she, very conveniently, sometimes is found with one, and sometimes with the other; and amongst them all the greatest peace and harmony prevails."—Nottingham Paper.

We insert, however, the wonderfully powerful picture of the old crone (which, by the by, Vestris diaguises far too little for effect: she should adopt a partial masque, and not look so pretty that no knight could refuse her advances):—

where, for the first time, the premiums of the Highland Society were thrown open to English breeders and agriculturists. The show of cattle, produce of husbandry, implements, improvements, &c. was equally extensive, and well cal-culated to be eminently useful; and we regret we cannot go into the detail of the prizes. Not only did the nobility and gentry of the Scottish border assemble on this occasion, but many came from the far north, and from the English counties. After the business of the day was over, above five hundred individuals dined. under the presidency of the Duke of Buccleuch and the Marquess of Tweddale (there not being any room to accommodate the whole together), and another party of sixty refreshed at a separate inn, headed by Scott of Raeburn. Such associations, and so supported, must be most beneficial to the country. Many interesting speeches were delivered; and the next annual meeting appointed to be held at Stirling.

Play-Bills .- One of the Covent Garden playbills of the week announced several " new novelties" as being forthcoming; which is very proper, for not a few dramatic novelties turn out to be old; and the Olympic advertised "To-morrow, Monday the 22d, will be performed" - oh, fie, Madame, to issue bills on Sunday!

The Tourist, from No. I. to No. VI. inclusive, is acknowledged; and though it adds one more to the list of weekly penny publications, we had not previously seen it. Its chief principle seems to be strong anti-slavery, which is supported by cuts of flogging slaves, &c. &c.; but there are also miscellaneous papers, among which we recognise the "Gipsy Party," from the Literary Gazette, appropriated, like many others, without acknowledgment.

Ancient Coins .- Every old copper, or other metallic piece of coin found i'the bowels of the earth, furnishes from time to time a paragraph for the provincial newspapers nearest the spot of discovery, which is duly copied into the London papers, and thence disseminated over the whole press of the country. Considering that most of these are very common articles, this species of intelligence does not seem to be of much importance, otherwise than to fill up the corners of columns in the journals when there is a scarcity of matter. We observe that a hoard of this sort has recently been dug up at the ancient monastery of Hexam, in Northumberland, which, from the account given of it, appears to be of some antiquarian consequence. It is said to be of the period of Ethelred, and the specimens very numerous.

Sir Walter Scott .- The impression made on the public by Mr. Swain's affecting poem, Dryburgh Abbey, in our No. 821, is testified by many letters we have received. Among others, two different writers have suggested the following additions, which we insert, though they are offered with great modesty by their authors.

CHEMICAL CATECHISM, in which CHEMICAL CATECHISM, in which the Elements of Chemistry, with all the recent Discoveries are very clearly and fully explaind, and its Applications to the Phenomena of Nature, to Agriculture, Manufactures, and Medicine, described. Hustrated by Notes, Engravings, &c.

"We estrem and recommend it. Every subject of interest connected with this delightful science is treated of in the clearest manner."—London Weekly Reviers.

"Every thing is here written up to the latest date, and the work cannot fall, we think, of being found eminently useful. The more important facts are exhibited with remarkable clearness, and the author has completely succeeded in supplying the defects of Mr. Parket's book."—Monthly Magazine.

"The necessity of a cleary progressive view of chemistry is evious, and the want of such a treatise has long been fell by the dents. Dr. Graham has well applied one want has book in a systematic and comprehensive, perspections want has been fell by the systematic and comprehensive, perspections want has been decided and complicate the various parts of the science, but ascenda from the first principles and simple elements to the compound and illustrative branches of the study."—Altas.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The String of Pearls. By G. P. R. James author of "Richelieu," "Henry Masterton," &c. 2 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Bentley. Few faculties more deserve or better repay cultivation than that of the imagination; it is the soil of mind whence flowers and fruits equally spring. The child when "Delightfully dwells he mid fays and talismans" is not only rich in present pleasure, but is unconsciously nourishing a sense which, through all his after-life, will prove one of his purest sources of enjoyment. The tales before us embody oriental superstitions under the form of pleasant narrative; and, in addition to interesting stories, the young reader will obtain much knowledge of the customs, manners, beliefs, and traditions of the East, which Mr. James must have turned over many a grave tome to acquire. We cannot here but observe, how much more moral the Asiatic mythology is than the Grecian. In the Olympian creed, the deities were rather capricious than just, and mingled with mankind not for the benefit of the inferior race, but for their own pleasures; while a terrible and inevitable Destiny oppressed all with equal injustice and cruelty. But in eastern tradition, the consequences of good and of evil are ever kept in view; the one is rewarded and the other punished, while benevolence is especially inculcated. When superior spirits mingle with mankind, it is for their advantage and instruction, or to counteract the designs of evil genii. It is from Arabian, not from classical literature, that our own fictions have taken the prevailing custom, of always finally punishing vice and rewarding virtue.

Rich in fancy, telling their story with great animation, these volumes deserve warm commendation. We must endeavour to give a specimen of their style, which, however, is not very easily done; for the tales are too long for quotation, and too connected to admit well of being broken into small portions. We must try. Even in these days of rail-roads, the following chariot would bear competition:

"When they had proceeded for some way along the banks of the lake - which were as beautiful as can be conceived, shaded with tall trees that hung down to the water, which, being very clear, reflected again all their leaves, and the beautiful flowers that some of them bore, they came at last to a little shady bay, round about being room enough for several persons to stand, but so surrounded by rocks, mountains, and forests, that nobody could over-look them, or see what they were about; and here Mahmood, the governor, stopped short, and taking the wood out of the hands of the alave, he made it into a pile, and putting the lamp to it, it presently took fire, and blazed up very high. As soon as he saw that it was thoroughly kindled, he ran round it three times,* repeating certain words in a low voice, which Prince Acbar, though he knew many languages, did not at all understand. Then snatching one of the lighted sticks from the fire, he took and drew some characters on the sand, such as we often see written on sabres and talismans. When he had done this, he retired back a little, and threw the stick into the lake; whereupon immediately they found the ground shake under them, and a great fear fell upon the slave, who thought that the day of judgment was about to come; but presently the ground opened before them, where Mahmood had written the characters, and instantly closed again, leaving behind a beautiful and rich chariot, made of the shell of a certain fish that lives in the China seas, and one of which, when empty, is large enough to contain a man upright. The wheels of the chariot were of amethyst, and the axle-tree consisted of one single stick of amber. Prince Acbar could have looked at the chariot for ever, had not his admiration been turned to the horses, which were of a dazzling whiteness, without one spot or blemish, with their nostrils and pasterns of pale pink; but that which was most extraordinary was, that just above their shoulder bone began the blade of a long wing, which folding down on each side, after the fashion of a bird's, were also of an excessive whiteness, all except one spot, exactly in the centre, which was enriched with rose colour and gold. It is also a thing to be remarked, that these wings lay flat and close to their body, and were covered with feathers similar to those of a swan. But it was their actions which surprised Prince Acbar even more than their appearance; for no sooner did they perceive the fire which the governor had lighted, but they both fell upon it, as other horses would do upon corn, and had soon eaten every bit up, flames and all. When Mahmood saw that the horses had quite done their fiery meal, he hastened Prince Acbar to take his seat in the chariot, and he himself followed, making the slave sit himself down at their feet, for it was scarcely large enough to hold three. As soon as they were all seated, the horses gave a loud neigh, and expanded their wings, which they fanned backwards and forwards for a minute or two, collecting air. At the same time, the amber axle of the chariot began to move of itself, and eight wings, exactly like those of the horses, starting out from the wheels, four being placed at equal distances on each wheel, were all at once put in motion by the turning of the axle-tree, and speedily wafted the chariot into the air."

sistent with every principle of magic, three being a cabalistic number of great influence."

These horses seem to bear some affinity to the

"These horses seem to bear some ammity to the camels which, according to the Mahommedan superstition, will be sent to carry the true believers into Paradise, which are furnished with white wings, and decked with gold. But this tale, which believe originated with All, seems rather at variance with the doctrine of the prophet himself. On how the camele could have their vider. himself; for how the camels could carry their riders over the Siral, which is a bridge sharper than the edge of a cimeter, I cannot conceive, unless they had been trained over the Siral, which is a bringe shalper than the Caphel believe, be found some use made of a circle, which has always been considered the emblem of eternity: running three times round the fire was, therefore, perfectly con-

The next extract might be a parallel to the story of the German prince, who, arriving in London at night, was quite distressed that the inhabitants should have illuminated on his account.

" The shop of an oriental tradesman is most frequently entirely detached from his dwelling; and so little idea have the nations of Asia of lighting their streets by any means, that when one of their most enlightened monarchs was informed that some of our cities were illuminated every night with globe lamps, he treated it as a traveller's tale, and concluded his expression of unbelief by saying, 'It cannot be true, for I should like to know who would pay for it;' with which sage remark all the sceptical court were very much delighted, and laughed three times at the joke of the sultan."

All our rapid buildings, even by contract, do not equal the edifices in Shadukaam.

"The next thing he saw was a palace constructed of roses, without any wood or stone whatever, and these were so fancifully trained, that of themselves they formed pillars and windows, and terraces, and were of three sorts red, white, and blue, regularly disposed; and these, he was informed by the geni, never decayed, and only from the growing of the plants changed their places, but always so as to form some new sort of architecture, keeping in just symmetry and proportion. When he had done admiring this, he turned to the other side, and beheld a palace built of a great number of columns of gold, which dazzled his eyes very much, as they were continually turning round so rapidly that he could scarcely see them; and which he could not at all comprehend, until such time as the geni told him that they belonged to a certain fairy, who delighted in air, and whose palace was made by forty whirlwinds, which, taking up the golden sand, as the wind does the sands of the desert, formed those columns which he saw. 'And if you will raise your eyes,' continued the geni, 'you will see that she has arched them all over with rainbows, which form a perfect dome."

We conclude with the famous sayings of Jemsheed :-

"The first was, 'God has no partner in his wisdom; doubt not, therefore, though thou understandest not.' The second, 'Greatness followeth no man, but goeth before him; and he that is assiduous shall overtake fortune. The third was written, 'Hope is always as much better than fear, as courage is superior to cowardice.' The fourth was, 'Seek not so much to know thine enemies as thy friends; for where one man has fallen by foes, a hundred 'He that telleth thee that thou art always wrong, may be deceived; but he that saith thou art always right, is surely a liar.' The sixth. Justice came from God's wisdom, but mercy from his love; therefore, as thou hast not his wisdom, be pitiful, to merit his affection.' The seventh, 'Man is mixed of virtues and of vices; love his virtues in others, but abhor his vices in thyself.' The eighth, 'Seek not for faults, but search diligently for beauties; for the thorns cosmogonies, like those contained in the Orphic most deserving compositions, and assigned to are easily found after the roses are faded." doctrines. The present work is particularly interesting, for it is the one which Messrs. Colburn and Bentley liberally purchased in MS., and whose product Mr. James presented to the Literary Fund. Its future possessors will thus have the satisfaction of adding charity to their gratification. Literature is the most uncertain of professions: dependent on health, on the contingencies of caprice, on the chances of trade. A fund whose aid has so often comforted the sick and the unfortunate, well deserves the encouragement which has hitherto rewarded its exertions. The String of Pearls has been one ruses and plays. The theatres were built of its tributes; and, both in this light, and for its own merits, we earnestly direct towards this

A Manual of Grecian Antiquities; being a compendious Account of the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Greeks: with an Appendix on the Greek Coinage and Currency. By G. H. Smith. 12mo. pp. 283. London, 1832. Priestley.

WE do not merely consider this volume to be an excellent book for upper-form boys and youthful students, but to possess merits which entitle it to the praise of the more mature scholar. The explanations of technical words and phrases relating to Grecian antiquities throw a strong light upon the delightful classics in that language, and enable us clearly to understand customs and manners which are otherform a very sufficient idea of the character, It was at the second Dionysia, The Annaia, or polity, and religion of the Greeks. Referring for good examples of the author's diligence and talent to a chapter of introductory remarks on the gods, another on dramatic contests, and also on the army, navy, architecture, and computation of time, we shall endeavour to exhibit the ability he has displayed by an extract or two, readily separable from the rest.

On the Religion of the Greeks it is well said -" Beside the popular religion, Greece possessed a religion of the initiated, preserved in the mysteries. The symbolical meaning would have been lost, if no means had been provided to ensure its preservation. The mysteries afforded such means. Their great end, therefore, was to preserve the knowledge of the peculiar attributes of those divinities which had under new forms; what powers and objects of at the Lenca under that of him called the king nature they represented; and how these, and archon. by symbolical usages and representations. The He perceived something coming towards mysteries preserved a reverence for sacred portance. Although they had their secrets, public festivals, processions, and pilgrimages, yet no one was prohibited from being a specgaze at them, it learned to believe that there was something sublimer than any thing with which it was acquainted, revealed only to the initiated; and while the value of that sublimer knowledge did not consist in secrecy alone, it did not lose any of its value by being concealed. Thus the popular religion and the secret doctrines, although always distinguished from each other, united in serving to curb the people.' Of the ancient Drama, - " Among the Greeks the drama was an affair of religion, and therefore an essential part of the festivals; and these being considered the business of the state, and regarded as necessaries, not luxuries, hence a Grecian state could not exist without festivals, nor festivals without choand decorated at the public expense; and there is no instance of their having been work the attention of the public. In accordance with the origin of the drama, its contests were confined to the Dionysia, or festivals of Bacchus, the patron deity of scenic entertainments. These festivals were three in number, and took place in the spring months of the Attic year. Ta zar' ayeous, or the rural Dionysia, were held in all the country towns and villages throughout Attica, in Hornday, the sixth Athenian month, corresponding to the latter part of December and the beginning of January. Aristophanes has left wise perplexing, if not unintelligible, and to us a picture of this festival in the Acharnians. τὰ is Λίμναις, so termed from Λίμναι, a part of situated the Annaior, an enclosure dedicated to not unfrequently the rival comedians exhibited their new pieces during the great Dionysia. Τὰ ἐν ἄστυ, τὰ κατ' ἔστυ, τὰ ἀστικὰ, οτ τὰ μιγάλα Διονύσια. At the time of this festival there was always a great concourse of strangers in Athens: deputations bringing the tribute from the several dependent states, visitants from the cities in alliance, and foreigners from all parts of the civilised world: for these Διονύσια were the dramatic Olympia of Greece. It was then that the new tragedies were brought out, and the great annual contest took place. We may estimate the importance attached to these scenic exhibitions, from the care manifested in providing by public enactment for their due regulation and support. They were placed under the immediate superintendence of the first magistrates in the state: the representations at the great been incorporated into the popular religion Dionysia under that of the chief archon, those to the contest, three actors by lot, together with a chorus. The impularai of each tribe selected one of their body to bear the cost and superintend the training of a chorus. This individual was termed xeenyos, his office xoenyia. Whilst some of the choragi provided the tragic and comic choruses at the two Dionysia, the others furnished the remaining choruses - the xogos arden, the xoeds raider, &c. We have fortunately a particular statement of the several choragic expenses left us by Lysias, in one of his minor orations. 'Απολογ. Δωςοδ. vol. i. p. 395. The dates referred to in this passage extend from B. c. 410 to B. c. 402; and consequently include the latter years of Sophocles and Euripides, with the prime of Aristophanes. During this period, we see that the expenses of a tragic χοςηγία were not quite 1001.; of a comic, little more than 501.; whilst that of the xopos aroper, the most costly of them all, amounted to about 1601. Some years after this a reduction seems to have taken place in choral expenses, for the charges of a tragic chorus are then stated as being 2,500 (80L) instead of 3000 drachmæ (100L) No one could legally be choragus of a chorus of boys unless he were above forty years of age. With respect to the other choruses, the age required in the several choragi is not known. No foreigner was allowed to dance in the choruses of the great Dionysia. If any choragus was convicted of employing one in his chorus, he was liable to a fine of a thousand drachmæ. This law did not extend to the Lenaa; there the Mirsus also might be choragi. The rival choragi were termed ἀντιχόρηγοι; the contending dramatic poets, and the composers for the Cyclian, or other choruses, arrandarana, the performers, arrivezes. The prize of tragedy was originally a goat; of comedy, a jar of wine and a basket of figs; but of these we have no intimation after the first stage in the history of the drama. In later times the successful poet was simply rewarded with a wreath of ivy. His name was also proclaimed before the audience. His choragus and performers were adorned in like manner. The poet used also, with his actors, to sacrifice the impiese, and provide an entertain. ment, to which his friends were invited. The victorious choragus, in a tragic contest, dedicated a tablet to Bacchus, inscribed with the names of himself, his poet, and the archon. In comedy, the choragus likewise consecrated to the same god the dress and ornaments of his actors. The merits of the candidates were decided by judges appointed by the archon. Their number was usually five.

"The actors were called browners, or aye. neral. They took every pains to attain perfection in their art: to acquire muscular energy and pliancy they frequented the palæstra, and to give strength and clearness to their voice they observed a rigid diet. An eminent performer was eagerly sought after and liberally rewarded. The celebrated Polus would sometimes gain a talent (or nearly 200%) in the course of two days. The other states of Greece were always anxious to secure the best Attic performers for their own festivals. They engaged them long beforehand, and the agreement was generally accompanied by a stipula-tion that the actor, in case he failed to fulthe contract, should pay a certain sum. The Athenian government, on the other hand, punished their performers with a heavy fine if they absented themselves during the city's festivals. Eminence in the histrionic prohow the universe came into being; in a word, dates presented their pieces. He selected the fession seems to have been held in considerable estimation in Athens at least. Players were | sible for private buildings to rival them. Arnot unfrequently sent, as the representatives of the republic, on embassies and deputations. Hence they became in old, as not unfrequently in modern times, self-conceited and domineering: pesiZor diverrai, says Aristotle, Tur wantur of irozeirai, the players have more influence than the poets themselves. They were, however, as a body, men of loose and dissipated character, and as such were regarded with an unfavourable eye by the moralists and philosophers of that age."

It is droll to find Aristotle thus blaming performers for the very same fault we hear so much imputed to them in the present day. On Greek architecture, the following is interesting, though briefly put. "No trace is to be found of any pavement in the streets. The houses of the heroes were large and spacious, and at the same time suited to the climate. The court was surrounded by a gallery, round which the bed-chambers were built. The entrance from the court to the hall was direct, which was the common place of resort. Movable seats $(\theta_0(m))$ stood along the sides of the walls. Every thing shone with brass. On one side was a place of deposit, where the arms were kept. In the back ground was the hearth, and the seat for the lady of the mansion, when she made her appearance below. Several steps led from thence to a higher gallery, near which were the chambers of the women, where they were employed in household labours, especially in weaving. Several outhouses for the purpose of grinding and baking were connected with the house; others for the common habitations of the male and female slaves; and also stables for the horses. The stalls for cattle were commonly in the fields. In the dwellings and halls of the kings there prevailed a certain grandeur and splendour, which, however, we can hardly designate by the name of scientific architecture. But when the monarchical forms disappeared, and the habit of living in cities began to prevail, and republican equality at the same time gained ground, those differences in the dwellings disappeared of themselves; and every thing that we read respecting private houses, in every subsequent age, confirms us in the idea that they had no pretensions to elegance of construction. It would be difficult to produce a single example of such a building. Indeed, we find express evidence to the contrary. Athens was by no means a fine city like some of our modern ones, in which there are whole streets of palaces occupied as the dwellings of private persons. A stranger might have been at Athens without imagining himself to be in the city which contained the greatest master-pieces of architecture. splendour of the city was not perceived till the public squares and the Acropolis were approached. The small dwellings of Themistocles and Aristides were long pointed out; and the building of large houses was regarded as a proof of pride. But when luxury increased, houses were built on a larger scale; several chambers for the accommodation of strangers and for other purposes were built round the court, which commonly formed the force and operation of exchequer bills. They centre; but all this might take place, and yet the building could lay no claims to beauty. a town, which was, it is true, but a provincial town, may be cited to corroborate this, we have one still before our eyes. A walk through the excavated streets of Pompeii will be suffi-cient to establish our remark. Where the at Samos, and made payable, in one instance, so great as among the Greeks, it was not pos- the general of division at Samos. These bills chitecture, as applied to public purposes, began with the construction of temples; and till the time of the Persian war, or that which immediately preceded it, we hear of no other considerable public edifices. The other principal kinds of public buildings which were conspicuous for their splendour, were the theatres, the places for musical exhibitions, the porticoes, and the gymnasia. This line of division. carefully drawn between domestic and public architecture by the Greeks, who regarded the latter only as belonging to the fine arts, gives a new proof of their correct taste. In buildings destined for dwellings, convenience and architecture are in constant opposition. The architect desires in his works to execute some grand idea independent of the common wants of life; but a dwelling is intended to meet those very wants, and is in no respect founded on ideas connected with beauty. The temples are dwellings also, but dwellings of the gods; and as they have no wants in their places of abode, art finds here no obstacle to its inventive powers."

We shall conclude with a quotation respecting the monetary system of Athens, which, if it does not present entirely novel features, certainly puts several curious facts in a very distinct point of view.

"The system of banking pursued at Athens gave occasion to a new kind of money, constructed upon the credit of individuals, or of companies, and acting as a substitute for the legal currency. In the time of Demosthenes, and even at an earlier period, bankers appear to have been numerous, not only in Pireus, but also in the upper city; and it was principally by their means, that capital, which would otherwise have been unemployed, was distributed and made productive. Athenian bankers were, in many instances, manufac-turers, or speculators in land, conducting the different branches of their business by means of partners or confidential servants, and acquiring a sufficient profit to remunerate themselves, and to pay a small rate of interest for the capital intrusted to them. But this was not the only benefit they imparted to the operations of commerce. Their ledgers were books of transfer, and the entries made in them, although they cannot properly be called a part of the circulation, acted in all other respects as bills of exchange. In this particular their banks bore a strong resemblance to modern banks of deposit. A depositor desired his banker to transfer to some other name a portion of the credit assigned to him in the books of the bank; and by this method, aided, as it probably was, by a general understanding among the bankers (or, in the modern phrase, a clearing house), credit was easily and constantly converted into money in ancient Athens. 'If you do not know,' says Demosthenes, 'that credit is the readiest capital for acquiring wealth, you know positively nothing.' The spirit of refinement may be traced one step further. Orders were certainly issued by the government in anticipation of future receipts, and may fairly be considered as having had the were known by the name of ανομολογήματα. We learn, for instance, from the inscription of the Choiseul marble, written near the close of the Peloponnesian war, that bills of this description were drawn at that time by the government of Athens on the receiver-general pomp and splendour of the public edifices were to the paymaster at Athens; in another, to were doubtless employed as money on the credit of the in-coming taxes, and entered probably, together with others of the same kind, into the circulation of the period. The gold employed by the ancients for their coin, if not obtained at first in a sufficiently pure state, was improved, as far as their means would admit of it, by grinding and roasting. They were not able to separate the baser admixture by any chemical process, but they could expel it by the action of fire, leaving the gold itself uninjured. It is in this way that we understand the words xevelou ἀπίφθου, used by Thucydides (ii. 13), which the scholiast interprets πολλάκις έψηθέντος, ώστε yiviolai obeugor, and the word obrussam occurs in Pliny and Suctonius, denoting gold so purified. But simple as the operation was, it seems to have been completely successful. The Darics of Persia appear to have contained only 1 part of alloy; the gold coins of Philip and Alexander reach a much higher degree of fineness; and from some experiments made at Paris on a gold coin of Vespasian, it appears that, in that instance, the alloy was only in the ratio of one to 788. In our own gold coin the alloy consists of one part in twelve.

"The medals of the ancients were produced by the hammer, rather than by melting. It appears, indeed, that the flan, or piece of unstamped metal, was commonly prepared for the die by melting, but afterwards the impression was given to it by the hammer. •

"It is a singular fact, that in very few instances have any two ancient coins been found which evidently proceed from the same die. The Prince Torre-Muzza, for instance, who was for many years a collector of Sicilian medals, could not find in his extensive cabinet any two that corresponded in all particulars with each other."

Again we bestow the meed of well-deserved approbation upon this very clever and very useful volume, which is well digested, and replete with every kind of valuable information.

The Juvenile Forget Mc Not: a Christmas and New Year's Gift, or Birth-day Present. 1833. Edited by Mrs. S. C. Hall. London. Ackermann; Westley and Davis.

WE do not know whether the children of this generation consider themselves particularly lucky: we think they ought, at all events in the present month, when poet, painter, and publisher, exert themselves so much for their amusement. The little volume now before us is enough to make November itself cheerful. Some of the stories are, according to our judgment, the very perfection of childish tales_information and instruction almost imperceptibly conveyed. L. E. L.'s "Indian Island" of her best contributions to the Annuals: there is a simplicity blended with imagination which gives it a peculiarity of interest. Mrs. S. C. Hall's "Seven and Seventeen" is another very delightful story; and we are glad to meet our old friend Mrs. Hofland, one of the most able instructors of youth. "The Settlers," by Miss Leslie, is a new and striking picture of the hardships endured by the early settlers; and hardships endured by the carry "Poetical all these are ushered in by a lively "Poetical Prefera" by W. H. Harrison. "My Dog Preface," by W. H. Harrison. "My Dog Quail" is, however, too interesting a personage for us not to find space for his history.

"Great pains had been bestowed on Quail's education: she was instructed by me and my brothers in every thing we supposed her capable of learning. These she acquired with extraordinary readiness, and very little severity. But the accomplishments thus taught her, numerous as they were, bore no proportion to empty he put a halfpenny into it, and gave frequently looking up and licking the face-a those which natural intelligence conferred upon her without instruction. When young, the first preparatory step was to make her perfect in fetching and carrying whatever she was sent for, both in and out of the water, till both elements were alike to her; and this seemed the foundation of every thing else. She soon learned to distinguish what belonged to every person, and to every part of the person. If I lost a glove, I shewed my hand to Quail, and she set out on a quest, searched every place in and near the house, and almost always succeeded in finding it. This she soon improved into finding, of herself, whatever was dropped, and conveying it to us. Many a pocket-handkerchief was saved in this way, which we never thought of sending Quail in search of. If I met, out of doors, a companion who asked me to walk, and I did not wish to lose time by returning for my hat, I had only to touch my head to Quail, and go on. Our hats lay on the hall table, and Quail never failed to return to the house, select mine from the rest, and holding it carefully out of the dirt, as she had been taught, bring it to me to a considerable distance. When sent back on such occasions, she sometimes found the door shut, and could not get in: having tried in vain to obtain entrance by scratching, she then adopted another method. There was no rapper to the back door, and the persons knocking generally thumped with their fist; this Quail of her own sagacity learned to imitate with her tail; she turned her side, wagged it against the door, and produced a sound which never failed to bring the people to open it, as if for some human being. Her capability of finding lost things was very useful to us. On one occasion I remember I went out to shoot rails, and having fired at a bird, I prepared to charge again, but could not find my powder-horn. This loss Quail soon comprehended, and instantly set back in search of it. My way had been through several meadows and fields, and across roads and ditches, since I had last used it: through all these she retraced my footsteps, frequently questing through the intricate crossings I had made several times over the same fields, and so unravelling the whole distance I had gone for several miles, at length found the powder-horn, and returned to me with it, after an absence of nearly an hour. The faculty of recognising and carrying away things that had been touched by us was used for a bad purpose, and severely compromised her character. There was an old woman who sold apples and oranges at the corner of the next street. We had a servant boy who often set his eyes on them. One day he took up an orange, and asked the price of it; but thinking it too dear, the old woman snatched it out of his hand, and bid him go home. This was observed by Quail; and when he returned, she immediately ran back, snapped up the orange, and brought it to him in triumph. When this quality was discovered, it was soon put into requisition, and all the fruit-women in the town were laid under contribution. The appearance of Quail in the market put every one on the alert; and many a severe blow she received in doing as she was bid. She at last, however, became so sagacious that she stole quietly behind the stall, watching her opportunity, and carried off the fruit without being perceived. When we found it out, we severely prohibited the practice. Her talent in carrying things in this way was sometimes useful to the servants. We had a very old woman who was fond of snuff, but not able to go for it herself.

it to Quail, who forthwith carried it in her mouth to the snuff-shop; and then, rising up to the counter with her fore-legs, she shook her head and rattled the halfpenny in the box. This was soon understood by the shopman, who took the money and filled the box, which Quail brought safely back to our old woman. Within doors her utility and sagacity were equally in requisition. We sat, in the winter time, in a large parlour, reading round the fire, with Quail between the legs of one of us, her head resting on our knees, and waiting for orders, either to ring the bell or shut the door, as occasion might require. On this latter duty she was often sent, as it was usually left open by whoever came in, and the room was sometimes very cold. Her method was to lift up her right fore-paw (for she had actually a human preference for the use of the right hand), and push the door forward till the lock clicked. On one occasion she could not move the door : and after sundry efforts she returned, whining in that peculiar way by which she expressed embarrassment. It appeared that the room was smoking, and the servant had opened the door to let the smoke out, and placed a smoothingiron against it to keep it so. Quail pondered for some time on the case, with her head on one side, when, as if the cause suddenly struck her, she ran at the smoothing-iron, and having dragged it away, she pushed with both her feet against the door, shut it, and returned to us rejoicing, with the same feelings, no doubt, as the philosopher when he discovered the mathematical problem. We often placed similar obstructions there, but Quail was never again embarrassed to find out the cause; she always, however, barked at it, and shook it after she had removed it, as if to express her displeasure for the trouble it gave her. When she found any thing that was mislaid, she was rewarded, and she was not long in applying this to profit. If a knife or spoon was dropped at dinner, she always took it up and presented it to the person next to it. When this did not happen, and she waited in vain, she proceeded to the sideboard, where knives were laid, with the handles sometimes projecting over the edge. Here she waited her opportunity, and when no one was observing, slily drew a knife forward, then let it fall with a noise, took it up, and proceeded to the next person and claimed her reward. It would be endless to mention all the instances in which she improved, by her natural sagacity, every thing she had been mechanically taught: and there were always such traces of reasoning on cause and effect, that it was almost impossible to suppose she was not gifted, to a certain extent, with the human faculty of arguing cases in her own mind and drawing conclusions. Her power of distinguishing persons was also very great, and decided by means very different from the mere instinct of smell. A circumstance of this kind occurred, which highly gratified an eminent and very sensible artist. Of all the inmates of our family, Quail was most attached to my mother, who returned her good-will, and was very kind to her. She had sat for her picture, and afterwards gone on a visit to a friend for a short time; and Quail seemed very uneasy at her absence. The picture, which was a strong likeness, was sent home; and before it was hung up, it stood on the sofa where my mother was used to sit. I could not account one day for the boisterous joy of Quail in the dining-room; but on looking in, I saw that she had recognised the pic-The boy was not always willing, and he taught ture, and was wagging her tail and frisking Quail to be his substitute. mark of affection she tried to pay to those she was fond of. When the picture was hung up, she never failed to notice it when she entered the room, and lay for some time before it on the carpet, gazing at it intently; and this practice she continued till my mother's return, and the original quite absorbed her attention from the representation. The ingenious artist who drew it frequently declared, that he considered this recognition the highest compliment that could be paid him, and he preferred it to the most elaborate eulogy of a connoisseur."

The Beauties of Percy Bysshe Shelley; consisting of Miscellaneous Selections from his Poctical Works: the whole of the Sensitive Plant. Adonais, Alastor, Julian and Maddalo, and Queen Mab free from the objectionable Passages. With a Biographical Memoir. Third 12mo. pp. 287. London, 1832. edition. Lumley.

GENERALLY speaking, we object to "the beauties" of any poet: if worth collecting, we are tempted to ask, as Dr. Johnson did of Donne when he gave him his Beauties of Shakespeare, "Very good, but where are the rest?" Shelley is a complete exception to this rule : long, unintelligible, and shadowy, as a whole - beautiful in detached passages — he is the writer, of all others, for whom selection is the royal road to popularity. His great fault is, that he writes poetry for poets, and requires too much imagination in his readers. There are some remarks, full of that excellent judgment which was Sir Walter Scott's great characteristic, that are peculiarly applicable to the generality of the themes selected by Shelley.

"The waste of boundless space into which they lead the poet, the neglect of precision which such themes may render habitual, make them, in respect to poetry, what mysticism is to religion. to religion. The meaning of the poet, as he ascends upon cloudy wing, becomes the shadow only of a thought, and having eluded the comprehension of others, necessarily ends by escaping from that of the author himself. The strength of poetical conception, and the beauty of diction, bestowed upon such prolusions, is as much thrown away as the colours of a painter, could he take a cloud of mist or a wreath of smoke for his canvass."

Shelley was in all respects a visionary; his good was unattainable, his beauty impossible—"he took no count of obstacles." But with moral and political opinions we have nothing here to do; and of the poetry scattered over his pages let the following extracts speak.

"When the lamp is shattered
The light in the dust lies dead—
When the cloud is scattered
The rainbow's glory is shed.
When the lute is broken,
Sweet tones are remembered not;
When the lips have spoken,
Loud exercise as seen 6-most Loved accents are soon forgot.

As music and splendour
Survive not the lamp and the lute,
The heart's echoes render
No song when the spirit is mute;
No song but sad dirges,
Like the wind through a ruined cell, or the meaning laws and the spirit is mute. Or the mournful surges
That ring the dead seaman's knell.

When hearts have once mingled,
Love first leaves the well-built nest;
The weak one is singled
To endure what it once possest.
O Love! who bewailest
The frailty of all things here.

Why choose you the frailest
For your cradle, your home, and your bier? Its passions will rock thee
As the storms rock the ravens on high;
Bright reason will mock thee,
Like the sun from a wintry sky.
From thy nest every rafter
Will rot, and thine eagle home
Leave thee naked to laughter,
When leaves fall and cold winds come."

"Ah! fleeter far than fleetest storm or steed,

An! fleeter far than fleetest storm or steed,
Or the death they bear,
The heart which tender thought clothes like a dove
With the wings of care:
In the battle, in the darkness, in the need,
Shall mine cling to thee,
Nor claim one smile for all the comfort, love,
It may bring to thee."

"Yet it is less the horror than the grace
Which turns the gaser's spirit into stone,
Whereon the lineaments of that dead face
Are graven, till the characters be grown Into itself, and thought no more can trace;
'Tis the melodious hue of beauty thrown
Athwart the darkness and the glare of pain,
Which humanise and harmonise the strain."

Exquisite comparison.

In the light of thought,
Singing hymns unbidden,

To sympathy with hopes and fears it heeded not." Fine description.

"Athens arose: a city such as vision
Builds from the purple crags and silver towers
Of battlemented cloud, as in derision
Of kingliest massonry: the ocean-floors
Pave it; the evening sky pavilions it;
Its portals are inhabited
By thunder-zoned winds, each head
Within its cloudy wings with sunfire garlanded,
A divine work! Athens diviner yet
Gleamed with its crest of columns, on the will
Of man, as on a mount of diamond, set:
For thou wert, and thine all-creative skill
Peopled with forms that mock the eternal dead
In marble immortality, that hill
Which was thine earliest throne and latest oracle."

"There is a cave,
All overgrown with trailing odorous plants,
Which curtain out the day with leaves and flowers,
And paved with veined emerald, and a fountain
Leaps in the midst with an awakening sound.
From its curved roof the mountain's frosen tears,
Like snow, or silver, or long diamond spires,
Hangdownward, raining forth a doubtful light:
And there is heard the ever-moving air,
Whispering without from tree to tree, and birds,
And bees; and all around are mossy seats,
And the rough walls are clothed with long soft grass;
As simple dwelling, which shall be our own;
Where we will sit and talk of time and change,
As the world ebbs and flows, ourselves unchanged."

Magnificent landscape.

Magnificent landscape.

"Beneath is a wide plain of billowy mist,
As a lake, paving in the morning sky,
With azure waves which burst in silver light,
Some Indian vale. Behold it, rolling on
Under the curdling winds, and islanding
The peak whereon we stand, midway, around
Encinctured by the dark and blooming forests,
Dim twilight lawns, and stream-illumined caves,
And wind-enchanted shapes of wandering mist;
And far on high the keen sky-cleaving mountains
From icy spires of sun-like radiance fing
The dawn, as lifted ocean's dazzling spray,
From some Atlantic islet scattered up,
Spangles the wind with lamp-like water-drops.
The vale is girdled with their walls, a howl
Of cataracts from their thaw-cloven ravines
Satates the listening wind, continuous, vast,
Awful as silence. Hark! the rushing anow!
The aun-awakened avalanche! whose mass,
Thrice sifted by the storm, had gathered there
Flake after flake, in heaven-defying minds
As thought by thought is piled, till some great truth
Is loosened, and the nations echo round,
Shaken to their roots, as do the mountains now."

Perhaps the following passage is among the finest embodyings of that regret for present suffering, and of the desire of unattainable excellence, which are our writer's chief charac-

"All things are sold: the very light of heaven
Is venal; earth's unsparing gifts of love,
The smallest and most despicable things
That lurk in the abyses of the deep,
All objects of our life, even life itself,
And the poor pittance which the laws allow

Of liberty, the fellowship of man,
Those duties which his heart of human love
Should urge him to perform instinctively,
Are bought and sold as in a public mart
Of undisguising selfishness, that sets
On each its price, the stamp-mark of her reign.
Even love is sold; the solace of all wo
Is turned to deadliest agony; old age
Shivers in selfish beauty's loathing arms,
And youth's corrupted impulses prepare
A life of horror from the blighting bane
Of commerce; whilst the pestilence that springs
From unenjoying sensualism, has filled
All human life with hydra-headed woes.
There is a nobler glory, which survives

All numan lite with nydra-neaded woes.
There is a nobler glory, which survives
Until our being fades, and, solacing
All human care, accompanies its change;
Deserts not virtue in the dungeon's gloom,
And, in the precincts of the palace, guides
Its footsteps through that labyrinth of crime;
Imbues its lineaments with dauntlessness,
Even when, from power's avenging hand, it takes
Its sweetest, last, and noblest title—death;—
The consciousness of good, which neither gold. Its sweetest, last, and noblest title—death;—
The consciousness of good, which neither gold,
Nor sordid fame, nor hope of heavenly bliss,
Can purchase; but a life of resolute good,
Unaturable will, quenchless desire
Of universal happiness, the heart
That beats with it in unison, the brain,
Whose ever-wakeful wisdom toils to change
Passon's the stoom for its sternal weel. Reason's rich stores for its eternal weal.

This commerce of sincerest virtue needs No mediative signs of selfahness, No jealous intercourse of wretched gain, No balancings of prudence, cold and long: In just and equal measure all is weighed, One scale contains the sum of human weal, And one, the good man's heart.

And one, the good man's heart.

How vainly seek
The selfish for that happiness denied
To aught but virue! Blind and hardened, they
Who hope for peace amid the storms of care,
Who covet power they know not how to use,
And sigh for pleasure they refuse to give—
Madly they frustrate still their own designs;
And, where they hope that quiet to enjoy
Which virtue pictures, bitterness of soul,
Pining regrets, and vain repentances,
Disease, disgust, and lassitude, pervade
Their valueless and miserable lives."

Beautiful scenery.

Of the tall cedar, overarching, frame
Most solemn domes within, and far below,
Like clouds suspended in an emerald sky,
The ash and the acacis floating hang Tremulous and pale. Like restless serpents, clothed
In rainbow and in fire, the parasites,
Starred with ten thousand blossoms, flow around
The gray trunks, and as gamesome infants; eyes. Starred with ten thousand blossoms, flow around The gray trunks, and as gamesome infants' eyes, With gentle meanings and most innocent wiles, Fold their beams round the hearts of those that love, These twine their tendrils with the wedded boughs, Uniting their close union; the woven leaves Make net-work of the dark blue light of day, And the night's noontide clearness, mutable As shapes in the weird clouds. Soft mossy lawns Beneath these canoples extend their swells, Fragrant with perfumed herbs, and eyed with blooms Minute yet beautiful. Silence and Twilight here, twin-sisters, keep Their noonday watch, and sail among the shades
Like vaporous shapes half seen; beyond, a well,
Dark, gleaming, and of most translucent wave,
Images all the woven boughs above,
And each depending leaf, and every speck

"Julian and Maddalo," we think, had better have been omitted. For the curious who delight in coincidences, we must point out one line __ most singular when we remember Shelley's melancholy fate. Julian, by whom he personified himself, after some sceptical remark, is thus addressed by his companion:

" If you can't swim, Beware of Providence.

With the exception of this one poem, the volume is not only beautiful, but contains a world of poetry and thought.

The Masque of Anarchy; a Poem. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. Now first published; with a Preface by Leigh Hunt. London, 1832. Moxon.

HAVING only a portion of this work before us, we prefer giving Mr. Hunt's criticism to our own, and shall leave till next week the expression of our proper opinion, especially as we have in our preceding review made some remarks on Shelley's genius.

"The poem, though written purposely in a lax and familiar measure, is highly characteristical of the author. It has all the ardour of his tone; the unbounded sensibility by which he combines the most domestic with the most remote and fanciful images; and the patience, so beautifully checking, and, in fact, produced by, the extreme impatience of his moral feeling. His patience is the deposit of many impatiences, acting upon an equal measure of understanding and moral taste. His wisdom is the wisdom of a heart overcharged with sensibility, acquiring the profoundest notions of justice from the completest sympathy, and at once taking refuge from its pain, and working out its extremest purposes, in the adoption of a stubborn and loving fortitude which neutralises resistance. His very strokes of humour, while they startle with their quaintness, and even ghastliness, cut to the heart with pathos.

" 'Anarchy the Skeleton,' riding through the streets, and grinning and bowing on each side of him,

As well as if his education Had cost ten millions to the nation, is another instance of the union of ludicrousness with terror. Hope, looking 'more like Despair,' and laying herself down before his horses' feet to die, is a touching image. The description of the rise and growth of the Public Enlightenment,

- upborne on wings whose grain Was as the light of sunny rain, and producing 'thoughts' as he went, As stars from night's loose hair are shaken, till on a sudden the prostrate multitude look up, and ankle-deep in blood, Hope, that maiden most serene, Was walking with a quiet mien, is rich with the author's usual treasure of imagery and splendid words."

Anecdote.—"I remember his coming upon me when I had not seen him a long time; and, after grappling my hands with both his in his usual fervent manner, sitting down, and look-ing at me very earnestly, with a deep though melancholy interest in his face. We were sitting in a cottage study with our knees to a fire, to which we had been getting nearer and nearer in the comfort of finding ourselves together; the pleasure of seeing him was my only feeling at the moment; and the air of domesticity about us was so complete, that I thought he was going to speak of some family matter, either his or my own; when he asked me, at the close of an intensity of pause, what was 'the amount of the national debt.'"

Again, speaking of a pamphlet of Shelley's:
"The title-page of the proof is scrawled over with sketches of trees and foliage, which was a habit of his in the intervals of thinking, whenever he had pen or pencil in hand. He would indulge in it while waiting for you at an inn, or in a door-way, scratching his elms and oak-trees on the walls. He did them very spiritedly, and with what the painters call a gusto, particularly in point of grace. If he had room, he would add a cottage, and a piece of water, with a sailing-boat mooring among the trees. This was his beau-ideal of a life, the repose of which was to be earned by a zeal for his species, and warranted by the common good.'

The preface does much credit to the kindly feeling and affection with which Mr. Hunt preserves the memory of his friend.

Discoveries of the Norman Navigators, in Africa, the East Indies, and America; folloved by Observations. By M. Estancelin, Deputy for the Department of the Somme.

THE author of this curious volume has raised a monument to the honour of Normandy, which will draw from unjust oblivion the ancient glories of the town of Dieppe. Every Frenchman will with pleasure accompany M. E. in his laborious researches. We say laborious; for our local archives being all dispersed and partly destroyed during the storms of the Revolution, it is necessary to search in private collections, and even in foreign countries, for documents relative to our cities.

Our histories state that the Portuguese discovered the west coast of Africa, and were the first that visited the East Indies, doubling the Cape of Good Hope. This is not fact: the Normans had passed the formidable Cape Nun, and had formed establishments on the Senegal, at Sierra Leone, &c., sixty years before the arrival of the Portuguese. One of the first Norman expeditions is of the year 1363: at the head of this expedition were Vallard of Dieppe, and Denis of Honfleur. This same Denis discovered a great part of Brazil.

It was the Normans who first settled in the Canary Islands. One of them governed there, with the title of king. Jean de Bethencourt, this king of the Canaries, was a native of the environs of Dieppe.

But there is something better still. A seaman of that town, Captain Cousin, anticipated by some years the celebrated discovery of the route to the East Indies by Vasco de Gama. Cousin sailed in 1488, and returned three years afterwards. This glorious voyage was not without advantage to Normandy. Ango, a merchant of Rocan, perhaps the richest private individual of the 16th century, partly owed his fortune to the spice trade with the islands of Sunda, before other nations had pushed their mercantile speculations beyond Cape

The collection of proofs is the really curious part of the book. Almost a century after the discoveries of Vallard, and Denis of Honfleur, on the coasts of Africa, the Spaniards sent Pietro Guirino, an experienced mariner, to see whether there were any inhabitable countries beyond Cape St. Vincent. Guirino was driven far into the ocean; he was tossed about for forty-five days in the Canary seas; and in his narrative, he says, "Luoghi incogniti e spa-ventosi à tutti marinari." Yet the Normans reigned quietly in these unknown and frightful countries.

Another remarkable particular is the following: - In our own times, Capt. Sabine, who seems to have undertaken to study the currents of the Atlantic, mentions, as something new, that the equatorial current and that of Guinea offer the phenomenon of two parallel currents in contact with each other, running with great rapidity in opposite directions. Precisely the same remark was made 150 years earlier, by M. Carolus, agent for our African Company.

The author takes care not to forget that a Norman ship was the first that penetrated to Australia, passing through the Strait to which Magellan gave his name seventeen years afterwards. He also reminds us, that we are indebted to his countrymen for the discovery of Newfoundland, and consequently for the little that we still possess in those seas.

Lastly, he adduces a Norman, J. B. de la Feuillade, as the first European who performed the voyage round the world, at least from west to east. The expedition of La Feuillade was in 1667.

France derived no advantage from the glorious discoveries of the Normans. thor thinks that his countrymen, desiring to keep to themselves the profitable commerce with Africa and India, refrained from publishing their discoveries, for fear of competition.-From a French Review.

Sunshine; or, Lays for Ladies. 12mo. pp. 86.
London, 1832. Willoughby.

A VERY lively and agreeable poetical variety. Messrs. Praed and Fitzgerald were the first to mingle pathos and pleasantry, and who deemed puns as potent as tears for relief. The present writer looks to the laughing side of the question, and makes as light of his miseries as possible; while the musical versification gives an easy flow to his sorrow. We subjoin two poems.

" A Lady's Advice. Why, love in a cottage, my dear, ls all very well for the young—But when you've been married a year, A different song will be sung; And flowers (if they suit the complexion) Are all very well for the hair, But jewels (a pretty selection) Have a vastly superior air.

Have a vastly superior air.

It's all very pleasant for girls

To prate about beautiful eyes,
Dark hair, and its masses of curls,
Love kisses and moonlight's soft sighs;
But spring with its lilies and roses,
For ever, my love, will not last,
And bowers where perfume reposes,
Must yield to December's cold blast.

I confess for myself when I married
I confess for myself when I married
I deemed that no pleasure could dwell,
Unless in a garden I tarried,
With dew-drops on violets to swell;
But dew-drops, and garden, and flower,
And incense, and light, and perfume,
Words of love, and a soft star-lit bower,
Passed away with the violet's bloom.

Passed away with the violet's bloom.

And as for the poetry of Fred,
Why, every one writes in these days;
Believe me, my love, if you wed,
You will not be the star of his praise:
Remember the old man may die,
Just think on your jointures, dear girl;
What a portion you'll have by and by,
How many a jewel and pearl.

You many a jewer and pearl.
You may then marry Fred if you like,
Or wherever your fancy may lead;
Ah! I see now my arguments strike—
(The last was a strong one indeed).
There, like a sweet girl, dry your tears
(They do make you look such a fright),
And, despite of your sighs and your tears,
We'll go and hear Pasta to-night."

" The Excursion.

The Ercursion.

Dear Harry, I'm making a party
To go up to Richmond by water—
As I know that your appetite's hearty,
We shall dine at the Star and the Garter:
There'll be Frederic Scheer from the city,
There'll be Adelaide Rose from the west;
And Mr. and Mrs. Van Chity
Are sure to go with us if pressed.

And I have in my head such a scheme,
I have got such a sweet girl to go—
Like the visions which come when we dream,
Like the thoughts of a young poet's brow:
You must quit, my dear brother, your books,
And come up from your studies to town:
Pray put on your very best looks—
I shall put on my very best gown.

I have managed the matter so well, I have managed the matter so well,
There will not be one man fit to talk with her;
You are certain to bear off the belle,
If you take but one nice qulet walk with her:
And you shall sit next her at table,
You shall breathe your soft tones in her ear;
(Make love to her while you are able—
She has got fifteen hundred a-year.)

You must praise all Madonna-like faces
(For she fancies that her's is that style); You must touch on her delicate graces, You must yow how adored is her smile; You can give her a stanza from Byron, With a melody out of Tom Moore; But don't say that you think her a syren, Or she'll possibly point to the door

Or she'll possibly point to the door.

You must speak about mutual affection,
You must talk about beauty and blight,
You must hint at your fear of rejection,
You must touch upon love at first sight;
You must give her a look of the tender,
You must talk about hearts that are fading—
If at that she declines to surrender,
I should try with a gentle upbraiding.

I should try with a gentle upbraiding.
But, Harry, I dare say you're smilling,
To think of my lecturing you;
Who all these fine nights are beguiling,
By keeping such lessons in view:
All I say is, my dear brother, come,
And I'll wager a dozen of gloves.
That when you go back again home,
You'll be murmuring of angels and loves.

We have only to add that the little tome looks very pretty in purple and gold.

Life of Sir David Baird. [Second Notice.]

In pursuing our review of this work, we regret to observe that its editor, Mr. Theodore Hook, enters with all the warmth of a partisan into allegations hostile to the East India Company and its Direction; which cannot but be reflected on the general character of the country. It is true that Sir David Baird was frequently opposed to the superior authorities, and never flinched from asserting his own claims and pre-tensions. It is equally true that his services were gallant and great; but we are not pre-pared to go along with his biographer, not only in contending that his views were invariably right, but that dissent from them involved misconduct or injustice. However, it is not for us to sift the various occasions of controversy, and we merely notice the facts in discharging our impartial duty as reviewers. We now resume the narrative from our last No.

Baird having returned to England, obtained the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 71st (originally the 73d), to which he was most zealously and affectionately attached; and a remarkable incident is thus told :-

"When Major Baird was in London at this time, and upon this business, he happened one morning to go into a coffee-house, and was expressing to a friend who was with him the annoyance he felt at the negligence of his Scotch agent, who had neglected to send up the money requisite for concluding the purchase of the commission. He had not observed that Mr. Ewen, a Madras civil servant, who had been his fellow-passenger on the voyage home, was sitting in the adjoining box, and had been paying particular attention to what he had been saying. Mr. Ewen, however, followed him out when he quitted the coffeehouse, and confessing that he had overheard his conversation, offered him any pecuniary ac-commodation he might require. Major Baird, although he declined the offer (apprehensive that something more serious than negligence might have delayed his agent's remittances), was yet sensibly touched by the kindness of the proposition, for which he expressed his warmest thanks. But it is curious to observe, that in consequence of this very piece of delicacy on his part, coupled with the unwarrantable delay of his man of business, Lord Cavan, Lord Ludlow, and Sir John Moore, were gazetted before him; and trifling as that circumstance appeared at the moment, its consequences were afterwards most striking. With all these officers Sir David afterwards met on service, and was of course their junior (by three or four days). instead of commanding them, both in Egypt and in Spain. Nothing can more fully justify the common remark, that the most important

Having rejoined his regiment in India, our gallant subject served with distinction in the campaign under Lord Cornwallis against Tippoo; which terminated in the forced submission of the sultaun in 1792, and the reduction of his wealth and power. In this war the storming of Savendroog, and the taking of other strong forts, afforded opportunities for displaying the bravery of Colonel Baird and his companions in arms. In one of the operations a misadventure befell the division under General Medows, through the faults of guides, and without the slightest imputation on the general, of which affair the following is told:-

"The feelings of General Medows, at this most untoward frustration of his own hones and the designs of the commander-in-chief, may easily be imagined, although it was universally admitted that no blame whatever could personally attach to him.

When General Medows at last did meet Lord Cornwallis on the Carrighaut Hill, which the reader will recollect was on the extreme left of the whole line, he naturally exclaimed, 'Why, Medows, where have you been all night?' Your lordship may well ask that question,' said the mortified general; and after giving all the explanation he could of the disaster, perceiving Lord Cornwallis to be wounded in the hand, he said, with an expression of stronger feeling than the words convey, 'It is I, my lord, and not you, who should have got a rap over the knuckles on this occasion.'"

There is a long account of the ensuing mi-litary command of Baird at Tanjore, and his quarrel with Mr. M-, the political resident, supported by the president in council; with which, as we have hinted, we will not intermeddle. Our only remark on this part shall be the critical one, that in history we do not see the use of designating a public functionary by the initials of his name "Mr. Msince, if it be worth ascertaining who the individual was, it is only troubling a reader to refer to preceding works, or to East India registers.

The issue of these disputes seems to have been unsatisfactory to the government; for the 71st regiment was broken up, and drafted into others, and Baird himself sailed for the Cape. Here he accepted a command; and when Lord Mornington (Marquess Wellesley) found him there on his way out as governor-general, an arrangement was effected, and he again went to Madras on the staff of the army.

The second and final contest with Tippoo ensued, and no man was more fit to take a leading share in it than the gallant Major-general Baird, whose previous knowledge of the Mysore, and exploits there, made him a leader of the utmost importance. We find, however, at the outset, much dissatisfaction that he should only be entrusted with the command of a brigade, while to a lieutenant-colonel, Arthur Wellesley (the Duke of Wellington), was confided the command of the Nizam force; and the author quotes a letter on the point to General Harris, in which he says -

"It must appear to every one extraordinary that a major-general, sent out expressly by his maiesty to serve on the staff in India, should remain in command of three battalions, while a lieutenant-colonel, serving in the same army. is placed at the head of seven, or rather thirteen corps. Meer Allum's request to have the brother of the governor-general in command of the troops under him, is certainly a reason;

effects frequently result from the most trivial rently degraded in the eyes of the army and causes." of my friends at home. stances, I trust to your adopting such measures as to you may appear proper, that the real cause may be made known, why Colonel Wellesley is appointed to a superior command."

The army, however, marched against Tippoo. and the war was carried to the gates of Seringapatam by a series of brilliant actions; among which we have an interesting version of the affair in which the Duke of Wellington failed, and which has been so often discussed and so often misrepresented. We copy it.

April 4th, "a body of troops and rocketmen assembled in considerable force in front of the line, under cover of a betel-tope,* called the Sultaunpettah Tope. Gen. Baird was directed, with part of his brigade, to dislodge them. He marched at eleven o'clock at night; and after scouring the tope in all directions, (at no time a work of easy operation, on account of ditches five or six feet deep by which it is intersected, for the purpose of watering the betel plants, and rendered infinitely more difficult by the darkness), he discovered that the enemy had already quitted their post. Their retreat rendered General Baird's further stay in the tope unnecessary, and he accordingly prepared to return to the camp; and an officer who had been attached to his force as a guide, confidently undertook to lead the way. At that period Lieut. Lambton of the 33d regiment, (afterwards Lieut.-Col. Lambton, whose scientific labours have made his name so familiar to the learned of all countries), who was on General Baird's staff, came up to him, and assured him that the troops were moving in an opposite direction to that which was intended, and were, in fact, marching directly towards the enemy. The guide was again appealed to, and was confident as before, although Lieutenant Lambton supported his opinion by the fact, that as the night was clear, he had convinced himself by watching the stars, that instead of proceeding in a southerly direction, which it was necessary to do to regain head-quarters, they were travelling due north. In this dilemma, General Baird took a compass from his pocket, and putting a fire-fly upon the glass, ascertained beyond a doubt that Lieutenant Lambton was right, or, as he used humorously to observe, that the ' stars were correct,' and immediately the troops were faced about; but owing to the detour which they had made, they fell in with one of the enemy's pickets, which they surprised; and having made prisoners of several of the men composing it, and seized their horses, they returned to camp, whence next morning the army was to march, to take up its ground before Seringapatam. The next day, how-ever, the enemy again possessed themselves of the Sultaunpettah Tope, as well as of some other neighbouring posts, whence it was deemed absolutely necessary to expel them. For this purpose his majesty's 33d regiment, commanded by Colonel Wellesley, was directed to perform a similar duty to that which it would have been General Baird's province to execute the night before, if the enemy had not abandoned their position; and Colonel Shawe, with the 12th regiment, was ordered to take possession of some other posts to the left. This force marched at sunset: Colonel Shawe got possession of a ruined village, and completely succeeded in his object; but Colonel Wellesley advancing at the head of his regiment, the 33d, whilst, as the order now stands, I am appaamongs the native of Linnaus, and an article of universal consumption amongs the natives of India."

into the tope, was instantly attacked, in the darkness of the night, on every side, by a tremendous fire of musketry and rockets-the men gave way, were dispersed, and retreated in disorder, several were killed, and twelve grena-diers were taken prisoners. The report of this disaster ran through the camp like wildfire, and the mortification and distress of Colonel Wellesley himself are described as having been excessive. On the following morning, General Harris ordered a detachment to be formed, consisting of the 94th regiment, two battalions of sepoys, and five guns, under Col. Welleslev's command, to make a second attempt upon the tope. As the 94th regiment formed part of General Baird's brigade, he accompanied it to the parade, where he found General Harris walking about. Upon the arrival of the 94th, all was in readiness for the march; but Colonel Wellesley did not appear to take the command. The troops having waited more than an hour under arms for their leader, General Harris became impatient, and ordered General Baird himself to take the command of them. He instantly mounted his horse, and called his aidede-camp; but a moment afterwards a generous feeling towards Colonel Wellesley (although he seemed destined to be his rival throughout the campaign) induced him to pause; and going back to General Harris, he said, 'Don't you think, sir, it would be but fair to give Wellesley an opportunity of retrieving the misfortune of last night?' General Harris listened to the kind and considerate proposal; and shortly afterwards Colonel Wellesley appeared, took the command of the party, and at its head succeeded in getting possession of the tope. This plain statement, while it successfully vindicates Colonel Wellesley from any imputation but that of ill success in a night-attack upon the tope, establishes the magnanimity and honourable feeling of General Baird in the highest degree; and it ought to be added, that it was with the greatest difficulty, in after-times, that General Baird could be brought ever to allude to the circumstance: and it was only a most absurd report connected with Col. Wellesley's conduct upon the occasion, that induced the general to explain the case, which, as it oc-curred on parade, and in the face of the whole army, is universally known to have been exactly as it is here described."

as it is here described.""

""What we have given above, is that which occurred within General Baird's own knowledge. By statements of various persons, and especially that (which is subjoined) of Colonel M'Kenzle, who was with Colonel Wellesley in the tope, his absence from parade is easily accounted for. 'When the light company of the 33d, with which Colonel Wellesley was leading the column, pushed perhaps too eagerly into the tope, they came suddenly on a work of the enemy, who opened a heavy fire upon them: the men, too much in advance, finding themselves not supported, retreated precipitately, leaving Colonel Wellesley and Captain Mackenzie by themselves. In such a helpless and hopeless situation, the only thing for these two individuals to do was to endeavour to regain the division; but, in attempting it, the darkness of the night was such, that they lost their way; and it was not until they had groped about through strange ground for several hours, that they alone reached the camp. When they arrived, Col. Wellesley proceeded to head-quarters, to report what had happened; but finding that General Harris was not yet awake, he threw himself on the table of the dinner-tent, and, worn out with fatigue and anxiety of mind, fell asleep. This is the statement made by the gallant Col. M'Kensle, who was Col. Wellesley's companion in the adventure. We give it as it has been repeated to us, and as we believe it; but we cannot quit the subject without remarking on the invidious partiality of Colonel Beatson (who, before he wrote his history of the war with Tippoo, had been an aide-de-camp of Lord Wellesley's, who, in describing the affair of the discomfiture of Colonel Wellesley's detachment in the tope, says:—'Colonel Wellesley advancing about the same time to attack the Sultaunpettah Tope, was upon entering it assailed on every side by a hot fire of musketry and rockets. This circumstance, joined to the extreme darkness of the eight, the uncertainty of the ememy's position, and the badness of the ground, induced him General Harris received the following letter from Tippoo, who appeared considerably moved by the extensive preparations which he saw in progress: __ ' The governor-general, Lord Mornington Bahander, sent me a letter, the copy of which is enclosed—you will understand it. I have adhered firmly to treaties. What, then, is the meaning of the advance of the English armies, and the occurrence of hostilities? Inform me. What need I say more?' To this General Harris, on the following day, returned this answer:—' Your letter, enclosing copies of the governor-general's letter, has been received. For the advance of the English and allied armies, and for the occurrence of hostilities, I refer you to the several letters of the governor-general, which are sufficiently explanatory of the subject. What need I say more? April 10, 1799. The peculiar style of oriental diplomatic literature, will, perhaps, render this letter and answer worthy the notice of the reader."

But having given place to these extracts, all we have now to do is to redeem our promise of contrasting Baird the conqueror of Seringapatam, with Baird the captive of our last Gazette.

"On the 3d of May the breach was considered nearly practicable, when General Baird, who had gallantly volunteered his services to command the storming party, (it having been determined that the storm should take place the following day,) was sitting with General Harris in his tent, discussing some details of deputy-adjutant-general, when a sudden explosion took place in one of the batteries, which had taken fire. General Baird and Colonel Agnew instantly ran to the front to discover the cause, not only of the explosion, but of a heavy firing which was kept up upon those who were attempting to extinguish the flames, in which service many lives were lost; amongst others, that of Captain Henry Cosby, who was killed by a grape-shot after he had descended from the merlons into the battery. In looking at this affair, General Baird saw in an instant that the whole strength of the enemy's fire came from a number of guns planted all round the breach. This he observed to Colonel Agnew, and also observed that under the circumstances he thought it would be better to give the breach an additional four-and-twenty hours' firing, in order to knock off those defences, and prevent the needless loss of a great number of men in the assault. Colonel Agnew replied, ' If you knew our actual situation as well as I do, you would not think so. We have but two days' rice in camp for the fighting men, and if we do not succeed to-morrow, we must go.'
'I am answered, sir,' said General Baird,
'either we succeed to-morrow, or you will never see me more;' and he instantly prepared to proceed on the service."

The storming force consisted of between four and five thousand men, Europeans and natives, and the whole of these troops "were in the trenches before day-break on the 4th; and in passing along, General Baird recognised a num-operation to the object of causing a diversion, and to postpone the attack of the enemy's post until a more provurable opportunity should after. Did Col. Beatson imagine that such a misrepresentation, however it might please Lord Wellesley, would gratify such a man as his brother?—or did Col. Beatson's concealment of the whole affair which transpired on parade the next morning, arise from the fear of exciting Lord Wellesley's displeasure, by exhibiting Gen. Baird's magnanimity and high feeling in their proper colours? The tone given to this portion of Colonel Beatson's narrative is somewhat too courter-like to be satisfactory to the man who reads for information."

The approaches proceeded, and "on the 9th | ber of his old companions of the 71st, and even some of his fellow-sufferers in his original captivity at Seringapatam. To these he spoke with his usual kindness and affability, and bade them recollect that they would soon have an opportunity of 'paying off old scores.' It may easily be imagined that such an appeal from their old commander had its effect. In the course of the forenoon, General Baird received the following communication from Colonel Close, the adjutant-general.

> To Major-general Baird, commanding the Troops ordered for the assault of Seringapatam.

'Sir_ -The breach being reported practicable, the commander-in-chief desires that the assault may be made this day, at 1 P.M. I have the honour to be, sir, your most obedient servant, ' BARRY CLOSE,

'Adj.-gen. of the Army. 'Head Quarters, Camp, 4th May, 1799.

' P.S. You are requested to shew this order to Major-general Popham, senior officer in the trenches.

" It was ten minutes past one o'clock in the afternoon when General Baird, having completed all his arrangements for his heroic enterprise, stepped out of the trenches, and drawing his sword, exclaimed to the men, in the most gallant and animating manner, 'Now, my brave fellows, follow me, and prove yourselves worthy of the name of British soldiers. The effect was like magic. In an instant both columns rushed forward, and entered the bed of the river, and being of course immediately service, together with Colonel Agnew, the perceived by the enemy, were in a few minutes assailed by a tremendous fire of musketry and rockets. The night before the assault Lieuterockets. nant Farquhar had crossed the river and placed sticks, indicating the best ford of the Cauvery. Colonels Sherbrook and St. John of course led the flankers of each column. General Baird had intended to lead the left column himself, but observing that the troops, being very severely galled by the enemy's fire, had swerved from the line of marks which had been made to direct their passage over the river, and had got into deep water (where, although they found themselves protected by the high bank of an old tank, their progress was necessarily retarded), dashed forward himself by the shortest and most exposed passage. By this intrepid movement he gained the opposite bank just at the moment the head of the first column reached t. He cheered the men by his personal example, and himself rushed onwards close to the forlorn hope, which in spite of the determined opposition of the enemy, made good its lodgment in the breach, in which, in six minutes from the first assault, the British colours were seen proudly floating in the breeze, by the troops, who were eagerly following their noble leaders. The gallantry and rapidity of this attack overcame all obstacles. In a few minutes more, the breach was crowded with men, who, according to General Baird's orders, filed off to the right and left. As the troops pressed forward, the enemy retired, and in a very short space of time another British flag was hoisted on the north-west bastion. When General Baird had reached the top of the breach, he discovered, to his inexpressible surprise, a second ditch full of water within the outer wall. The almost insurmountable difficulty of overcoming this unexpected impediment staggered him, and he exclaimed, 'Good God! how shall we get over this?' Fortumen who had been repairing the wall, by availing himself of which he was enabled to surmount that which at first appeared an unconquerable obstacle. Having immediately taken advantage of the opportunity which thus luckily presented itself, he crossed the inner ditch, and proceeded by the ramparts to the other side of the fort, where the two columns were to meet, and enter the body of the town. The attack was so sudden and even unexpected, being made in the broad noon of day, and at the general hour of dinner, that the assailants met with no very considerable resistance. The left column, however, was more vigorously opposed; they proceeded along the north ram-part, which they found traversed and well defended. It was there Tippoo placed himself; he was the last man to quit the traverses, as they were successively taken possession of by the European troops, and was seen firing upon his enemies with his own hand, his attendants loading and handing him the firelocks; being wounded, however, he endeavoured to return with his people through the sally-port into the fort. It is necessary to observe that part of the 12th regiment, not in strict obedience to orders, instead of proceeding with the rest of the left column along the ramparts, pressed forward into the body of the town, and kept along the inside of the rampart, and found themselves opposite the sally-port, through which the sultaun proposed returning. instantly halted, and commenced firing from the inside, while the rest of the column were firing from the outside, so that Tippoo was literally placed between both fires; and it is to this accidental variation from the orders given to the 12th, that his death may be attributed. for it was on this very spot, as we shall presently see, that he was found buried under the bodies of hundreds of his faithfully devoted subjects and defenders. Meanwhile, General Baird, with the right column, having cleared the south rampart, halted at the east cavalier to give the men breathing-time after the fatique they had endured under a burning sun, before they entered the town to summon the palace; and while they were resting, Colonel Close came to General Baird, and told him, that a native officer who accompanied him, assured him that Tippoo had caused the twelve grenadiers of the 33d regiment, whom it will be recollected had been taken prisoners on the night of the 5th of April in the Sultaunpettah Tope, to be murdered. General Baird desired Colonel Close to be extremely particular in his inquiries touching the truth of his report, which the Mussulmaun persisted in repeating; and when General Baird marched towards the palace, he told Colonel Wallace, of the 74th, that if the man's story was true, the instant he laid hands on Tippoo, he would deliver him over to the grenadiers of the 33d regiment, to be tried for the murder, in cold blood, of their comrades. As the troops were now in possession of every part of the ramparts, and it appeared hopeless in the sultaun to make further resistance, General Baird sent forward Major Allan, to offer protection to all persons, Tippoo himself included (for General Baird did not believe the story of the murder of the English soldiers, knowing the mendacity of natives, who may be interested in doing mis-chief), provided they all surrendered themselves unconditionally; and this proposition was made, with the alternative, that if it were not accepted, the palace would be instantly asnately, however, in leading the troops along saulted, and no quarter given. Upon arriving the ramparts, he discovered some scaffolding, at the palace, Major Allan found Major Shee, which had been raised for the use of the work- with part of the 33d drawn up opposite to the dently in a state of great alarm and agitation. In a short time, however, Major Allan, together with Captain Scohey and Captain Hastings Frazer, were admitted into the palace by the killadar, and brought into the presence of two him. To these he addresses verses, and trifles of the younger princes, whom the British officers endeavoured to reassure by promises of protection; and for the purpose of calming all their personal apprehensions, Major Allan offered to remain with them himself. Soon after this, General Baird arrived at the gates of the palace."

The body of the sultaun was found, as is well known; and therefore we here conclude our narrative.

" The loss of the European and Indian army during the siege, was twenty-two officers killed, and forty-five wounded, one hundred and eightyone European non-commissioned rank and file killed, six hundred and twenty-two wounded, and twenty-two missing; one hundred and nineteen natives killed, four hundred and twenty wounded, and one hundred missing-of the officers twenty-five were killed and wounded in the assault. Upon his return to the palace, General Baird took with him the 74th and the 33d regiment, ordered them to pile their arms in one of its magnificent courts, and posted guards for the protection of the zenana, and after the fatigues of the eventful day, laid himself down to rest on a carpet in the verandah; thus ensuring and enforcing by his presence the protection he had promised to the helpless women and the family of the dead sultaun, who had in the days of his ascendency inflicted on him the horrors of a long and dismal imprisonment, and that too, as has been observed, within a few paces of the very spot where he then reposed, his conqueror!"

Another subject of misunderstanding, and we have finished.

" General Baird having done this, was proceeding to make further arrangements for the tranquillisation and regulation of the town, when Colonel Wellesley arrived at the palace, bringing with him an order from General Harris to General Baird, directing him to deliver over to him (Colonel Wellesley) the command of Seringapatam; the city which he had conquered the day before, and the conquest of which was to him, above all living men, most glorious - and, to use the memorable words of the hero himself (found in the copy of a letter in his possession), 'Before the sweat was dry on my brow, I was superseded by an inferior officer.' Deeply did General Baird feel this unexpected blow - but his regret, though mingled with surprise, we may even add, with indignation, partook of no personal feeling of hostility against Colonel Wellesley, whose actual merits, as we have already observed, he always justly appreciated, and whose future exaltation he always confidently anticipated."

The Poetic Negligée. By Caleb, Author of "Vox Populi." 12mo. pp. 262. London, 1832. Simpkin and Marshall.

THE greatest merit of this book is, that it is printed on pink paper—as if the writer blushed for publishing it. Of all the things about which a poor poet can write, his "loves," as he pleases to call them, are the least interesting to other people; and we doubt if even the Fannys and Kittys to whom such stuff is addressed, care much for the threadbare compliments and trite protestations they contain. A bad imitation of Scott is bad; a bad imitation of Byron liberal and enterprising, -whose results could to be compiled by some idler of an officer, who, having nothing else to do, fancies he is in love with every woman he meets, and intrigues with such of the most free of them as will let away that portion of his time which is not worse employed. But what has the public to do with this?—cannot people keep their follies to themselves!

Family Classical Library. No. XXXV. Valpy. THIS No. gives us the second vol. of Euripides, and consists of six tragedies.

Shakespeare, with Illustrations. Vol. I. 12mo Valpy.

THE first of an edition of Boydell's Shakespeare, with the text of Malone, 1821, published according to the prevalent monthly mode. A hundred and seventy illustrations are promised; and every person of taste knows how charming these illustrations (Boydell's) are. The present volume, besides a portrait, contains several, in outline, by Romney, Smirke, Hamilton, and Angelica Kauffman, which grace the text in a very pleasing manner, and are well calculated to render the edition popular.

The Four Gospels, in Greek, for the Use of Schools, from the Text of Griesbach, &c. 12mo. pp. 257. London, 1832. Taylor. This is a very neat edition of the Gospels, with useful marginal references to parallel passages. and the most important varia lectiones from Mill and others as notes. We have read three or four chapters, and can say that it is very carefully printed: there is, however, in our copy a blunder that renders it imperfect, and which we suppose is an oversight of the binder: of the first leaf of John's Gospel we have two impressions, and none of the second and third.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

CAPTAIN ROSS'S EXPEDITION IN SEARCH OF A NORTH-WEST PASSAGE.

IT is seldom, we believe, that the voice of humanity is heard without an echo in this country; and we hail with no common sympathy an appeal, made at last, in the cause of the suffering, perhaps, assured that it cannot be made in vain, on behalf of those whose home is the boisterous sea, or whose shelter may be the snow-hut, or the floating iceberg. It is now more than three years since Captain Ross took his departure in search of a north-west passage. In November 1829, he was heard of, as having touched at Icelanburgh, on his northward course. In the month of July it was subsequently reported that the steamer had lost its fore-mast, which was afterwards replaced at Holsteinberg, in Greenland, where the Rockwood, of London, was providentially found, deserted by her crew, and from which the expedition supplied themselves with provisions and stores. The only subsequent account that has reached us was inserted in the Gazette for Jan. 1831. It was mentioned that Capt. Ross, after his refittal, had been forced back into Lively Bay, Baffin's Bay, where himself and his little crew spent the winter of 1830. The thoughts of where they may have passed the winter of 1831, must excite feelings of the deepest anxiety and sympathy. We do not demand the same ostentatious display of research that accompanied the death of La Pérouse; but, though Captain Ross was not employed by government, the nature of his undertaking,- gate, in the balcony, over or near which se- worse: but a bad imitation of Moore is the only be of public advantage and beneficial to veral of the sultaun's family appeared, evi- worst of all. We can suppose such a collection civilisation, demand some sacrifices on the part civilisation, demand some sacrifices on the part of those for whom that brave commander made

The humane and patriotic design of despatching an overland expedition through the northern continent of America, the chief object of which will be to endeavour to ascertain the fate of Capt. Ross and his companions; and, if within the scope of human powers, to restore them to their country, was brought forward at a meeting convened for the purpose on Thursday at the Horticultural Society's chambers in Regent Street. Sir George Cockburn was in the chair, supported by Mr. Hay, under-secretary to the colonial department, Sir Byam Martin, and many other distinguished naval officers and scientific persons.

The chairman ably and eloquently dwelt on the debt owed by the country to the gallant and adventurous men who endured the fatigues and dangers of distant expeditions to serve the cause of science and exalt the fame of their native land; and then particularised the career of Captain Ross, his chagrin at failing in his first voyage, and his subsequent attempt, at his own peril and expense, to complete the work left unfinished even by the exertions of Parry and Franklin. To stimulate future Britons of the same noble and enterprising character, and to shew that their country never forgot those who, though out of sight, were so devotedly employed in her service, he warmly enforced the propriety of sending out this expedition. He also adverted to the admirable qualifications and gallantry of Captain Back, who had volunteered to lead it; and finally estimated the expense of the attempt for two years at 50001.; and if persevered in for three, at 7000/. Of this sum Lord Goderich had recommended to the treasury to give 20001.; the rest he could not for a moment doubt would be immediately raised by public subscription.

We regret that we cannot go more at length into this interesting meeting; but, owing to a mistake, our reporter failed in attending it, and we can only recall to memory the principal

Some conversation ensued, in which it was explained, that the Hudson Bay Company had already exerted themselves to promote the success of the inquiry in the northern parts of America. That it was supposed Captain Ross and his comrades might have reached the Fury, abandoned by Captain Parry, and found in her shelter and fuel. The impression that our brave countrymen might yet exist, and be rescued, was strongly corroborated by the opinion of Captain Beechey, who eulogised Captain Back in the most handsome manner, as the fittest person to conduct the enterprise; but stated that himself, and other naval officers, had been ready for some time to volunteer the same service, in the firm belief that their labours might not be in vain.

Captain Back acknowledged the compliments paid to him. Thanks were voted to the Hudson Bay Company, Sir G. Cockburn, Lord Goderich, and Mr. Hay. Resolutions in furtherance of the object were agreed to, a committee of management named, and a subscription opened. About 800l. was down when we last examined the list; and there can be no question that, almost as soon as generally known, more than the whole sum required will be forthcoming, especially as the East India Company, the Trinity House, and other large bodies, may be expected to subscribe liberally.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

AFRICA

WE have in a literary notice alluded to the appearance of the second volume of the Transactions of the Royal Geographical Society; but, late in the week as it is, we cannot refrain from quoting a passage relative to the late traveller Mr. Coulthurst, the last victim to that destructive climate.

" Mr. Coulthurst was the only surviving son of C. Coulthurst, Esq., of Sandiway, near Northwich, and was thirty-five years of age at the time of his death. He was educated at Eton; studied afterwards at Brazen Nose College, Oxford, where he took a very honourable degree; was entered at the Middle Temple, called to the bar, and resided six years in Barbadoes, where the influence of an uncle, who held a high legal situation in the West Indies, seemed calculated to bring him into advantageous practice. But from infancy his heart was set on African enterprise. His family is still in possession of some of his Eton school books, in which maps of Africa, with his supposed travels in the interior, are delineated; and at Barbadoes he used to take long walks in the heat of the day, in order to season himself for the further exposure which he never ceased to contemplate. His eager desires also took a poetical form; and a 'Soliloquy of Mungo Park,' and other pieces of a similar description, of considerable merit, were written by him at different times. The stimulus which at length decided him, however, was the recent success of the Landers. He feared that if he delayed longer, another expedition would be fitted out on a great scale, and leave nothing which an individual could attempt. He completed his preparations accordingly."

Having quoted this fragment of interesting biography, we shall surely gratify the feelings of our readers by submitting to their perusal, from original MSS., some of the poetical compositions here alluded to. The first is very affecting,

Supposed to be Mungo Park's Soliloquy.

Supposed to be Mungo Park's Solitoquy.

While from the forest frowning down the steep,
O'che half the plain noon's changing shadows sweep,
Cheerless and sick, and wearied and alone,
Beneath this hanging rock I sit and moan!
Whose moss-grown canopy, on high o'enspread,
From the fierce rays shall shield my throbbing head:
Kindly it bids me to its shelter trust,
Or, kinder still, 'twill crush me into dust.
Friendship! revered, but yet afflicting name,
This thirsty desert nursed the quickening flame,
With that warm cement joined our kindred hearts,
Which mutual suffering, mutual hope, imparts;
But, oh! delusive, like the vapoury beam
That lures the stranger to his fabled stream,
To add excitement to the pangs of thirst;
On me 'tis well its vengeance shed the worst!
Thy couch the wild flowers, on whose scented air
Thy soul rose joyful to her God in prayer,
When flashed conviction on this erring mind,
Who rears a flower, will he neglect mankind?
There art thou laid! affection's fostering care
Sank o'er the toils too fondly asked to share—
Cheered by fresh hopes, fresh scenes, we blithely strayed,
'Neath the tail palm or sweet mimosa's shade.

With features rude as when the world began,

With features rude as when the world began, With features rude as when the world began, Here nature ranges uncontrolled by man; So wild and wondrous all my soul to fill, The landscape brightens from each lonely hill. Fantastic cliffs that pierce my bleeding feet, With horrid glare reflect the burning heat, From whose high pinnacle I dimly view A sandy ocean and horizon blue; Where not the acacia strikes her tapering root, Nor zebra browses mid her golden fruit; Encircling forests to the glowing skies Blend their rank foliage in a thousand dyes.

No friendly negro bids the stranger stay—
The Bushman's voice hath charmed his heart away;
The swarthy Moor with a vindictive zeal,
Spurs his proud steed, and grasps his angry steel.
Better to fall exhausted on the waste,
Than the lone captive's cup of sorrow taste;
Than lingering pine upon this sun-worn shore,
Where shapeless caves swing back the hyema's roar;

And see on sails of speed the ostrich roam. That will not waft me to a happier home.

Ye bright sands, rippling with inconstant wave,
That soon may drift o'er mine unhonoured grave—
Ye foes that hunt me with religious hate—
I spy relief, nor that at Ali's gate,
Where insult cannot gibe, nor faith betray,
But living fountains for the thirsty play;
Glare, mid-day's heat, or evening vapour's fly!
The friendless Christian does not fear to die.

Scared from the swampy dingle far below, Spreads the wild pelican her wings of snow, And on her tender errand as she flies, And on her tender errand as she flies,
To my strained sight what long-lost forms arise?
Of love and friendship, as in act to part,
Pressed their warm fingers to my withering heart,
But could not calm the fever of unrest,
Th' impassioned pulse that played within my breast;
That undefined, perchance, celestial fire,
Which still shall glow, till worlds themselves expire.
Yes, let the dreary wilderness extend
On the dark thicket, blackest clouds descend,
Or envious sand-hills guard the servet suring. Or envious sand-hills guard the secret spring, Yet check not Enterprise his early wing.

Our next specimen consists of Lines written at Sea. Upon the wide and wintry seas

As desolate I roam,
My throbbing spirit, ill at ease,
Sighs for its native home;
For all the nameless blandishments
That grace the cherished spot:
Discomfort shines through wind-worn rents,
The sailor's rugged lot.

I raise my head and clear my brow, And strive not to repine, And the heart's sickness disavow, And view the eddying brine:
But with the heaving billows' swell,
My heart seems heaving too;
And thoughts that tears forbid to tell
Come crowding fast to view.

come crowding fast to view.

I fancy whilst the hissing urn
Its cheering chorus gives,
Some ask when next will he return?—
Where now his vessel lives?
My sister, I thy hand did press,
When her fresh sails were set—
As thy young eyes of tenderness,
They now are drinning west

They now are dripping wet. And driving with the weltering tide
On Afric's rugged shore,
Returns my boyhood's cherished pride,
In that dark country's lore.
But when return the envied days
Together we have next?

Together we have spent? Yet shall, between the ocean's lays, Each wish towards home be sent.

Each wish towards nome be sent.

Each fairy dream of happiness,

Each web of fancy spun,

Thither recline, all consciouses,

As shadows to the sun;

And though the breeze my mirror break,

Another still succeeds—

The idea won't the soul forsake,

O'er which it freshly bleeds.

Yes, tropic suns may drink the blood
Of young life to the lees,
But cannot crisp the changeless flood
Of thoughts so prized as these;
Nor tropic gales more flerce can blow
Within their viewless sphere,
Than this lone bosom's ever glow
For those more doubly dear.

The next strain has, we believe, been printed before, in a provincial journal: it also still turns towards Africa.

On the Death of Major Laing. I wish I were laid upon Zara's sand,
Where thou art so calmly lying;
And the speaking eye, and the firm-set hand,
But an ebb to its wane supplying.

For short is the pang of the murderous arm, And soon does the life-blood thicken; And a noble cause sheds a sunset charm, As the ambushed arrows quicken.

Almost I could envy thine early fate, Were it not for one forsaken, Where you Roman archery rears its state, And the Syrtes' currents waken.

And nobler by far than the battle-field
Is the couch where thou art lying—
The wide horizon's purple shield,
And the Simoom's blazon flying.

In conclusion, we copy from the Transactions country-the theme of these lays :- an association (with a capital of 50001) for Hancock, Wyatt, Mrs. Carpenter, R. B. Davis, the purpose of trading to the source of the river Gambia, or as high up as should be found practicable. They assumed the appellation of the 'Tandah Company,' from Tandah, the name of the country highest up the river of which they had any authentic information; the principal trading port of which, called Tenda-Conda in the chart, is stated to be several 'tides' above the Falls. of Barraconda. Tandah, and the neighbouring states, are very productive in wax, hides, and ivory; and contain, it is said, some mines of gold. The people, who are of a mild disposition, have shewn much inclination to trade; but, through the intervention of the Woolli tribe, have hitherto been prevented from reaching the British factories. The object of the merchants is, in the first place, to effect a firm footing in the Tandah country, where they hope to draw a considerable gum trade from the neighbouring states; and then, by degrees, to attract the traders from Bambaak, Kaarta, Bambarra, Bourree, Koukan, Footah-Jallon, and the intermediate countries, to all of which Tandah is a central point. The lieutenant-governor thinks that the extent to which the merchants may be thus able to open an intercourse with the interior of Africa, can hardly be estimated, if the company should form caravans of the discharged soldiers on the coast, many of whom are natives of those countries, and who could join with the merchants and trade in coffilahs between the Gambia and Sego, Bourree, Timbuctoo, &c. He therefore applied for the permission of the secretary of state to incur a small expenditure in exploring the river with the colonial schooner and canoes; and expressed an intention of performing this service in person. Lord Goderich approved of this expedition, and the lieutenantgovernor has only been prevented from as yet effecting his object by the recent hostilities in which he has been engaged with the King of Barra."

PINE ARTS.

WINTER EXHIBITION Of deceased and living British Artists, Suffolk Street, Pall Mall.

THE Suffolk Street Gallery will open to the public on Monday next, with what may be termed a winter wreath of art; in which the past and the present of the British school are to a certain extent brought into juxta-position; and although the near neighbourhood of the evergreens of former days, the tints of which have been mellowed and enriched by the hand of time, may in some respects be unfavourable to plants of recent growth, yet there are points in which the comparison will be in no way discreditable to the latter.

Of the attractions of this novel exhibition we can speak with confidence: and we have no doubt that the variety of talent thus assembled will prove highly interesting to the public in general, as well as to the amateur. To say that the rooms are rich in examples from the pencils of Dobson, Walker, Richardson, Jervas, Reynolds, Wilson, Hogarth, Worlidge, Gains-borough, Zoffany, Loutherbourg, Opie, Mor-land, Romney, Kirk, Raeburn, Harlowe, West, Owen, Hoppner, Fuseli, Bonington, Jackson, Lawrence, Northcote, Liverseege, &c., would be a sufficient guarantee for the truth of our assertion, even were we unable to add, that of the following curious notice connected with the living art, many productions of various degrees of merit will be found under the names of "In the month of May 1831, most of the Stothard, Smirke, Hart, J. Wilson, Allan, merchants at Bathurst formed themselves into Child, Clater, Starke, Linton, Wood, Burnet,

Lance, Holland, Barker, Boaden, Kidd, Linnel, Roberts, R. T. Bone, Miss Dagley, Thayer, &c. &c.

The works are upwards of three hundred in number. We shall take another opportunity of pointing out such as appear to us to be most deserving of notice.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Finden's Landscape Illustrations of the Works of Byron. Part VIII. Murray. THE preceding parts of this delightful publication have exhausted our vocabulary of admiration; and were it not so, we should find it difficult to discover words that would adequately express our sense of the beauty of "Bacharach," after Turner; "St. Sophia, Constantinople," after Roberts; "Mount Etna," after Purser; "The Simplon," after Gastineau; or "Verona," after Calloott. They may be equalled, but they can never be excelled.

Major's Cabinet Gallery of Pictures. With Historical and Critical Descriptions and Dissertations, by Allan Cunningham. No. III. WE think this a decided improvement upon the former numbers of the work. The Wilson, especially, is a very rich and beautiful plate.

Memorials of Oxford. Edited by the Rev. J. Ingram, D. D., President of Trinity Col-With Engravings by J. Le Keux, from original Drawings by F. Mackenzie. No. I. Oxford, Parker, Slatter, and Graham; London, Tilt.

WHEN Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Le Keux combine their talents, the result must always be highly satisfactory. The present number contains two very pleasing plates; especially the view of the interior of the Chapter House of the Cathedral.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

ON THE DEATH OF SIR WALTER SCOTT. I, who, erewhile, with Hope's delightful strain,
To Italy's bright sun and siren bay,
O'er the blue splendour of the midland main,
Accompanied the Minstrel on his way,
And preluded his glories yet to come—
The golden close of Fame's unclouded day—
Now strew these fading flowers on his untimely tomb.

HARP of the North! Death's ruthless stroke Thy chord, that witched the world, has broke, And thou in Dryburgh's hallowed gloom Ly'st on the great magician's tomb Thy chord is broke, but ne'er shall die The echo of his minstrelsy. Drawn by the magic of his rhyme, Wild, romantic, bold, sublime, Not Caledonia's sons alone, The race of her poetic zone, But in far Dryburgh's still retreat The pilgrims of the world shall meet, And tell of him whose changeful lay Held o'er each heart resistless sway Could rouse the passions, yet control-

Yet while his lay had power to bind In chain of sympathy mankind, And on the universe imprest Each image glowing in his breast, While o'er the world his spell was thrown, Scotland, his heart was thine alone-To thee the patriot passion given, Thy rocks, thy lakes, his earthly heaven.

Could soothe, yet elevate the soul-

And tranced in visions of delight

The summer day and winter night.

Por this tribute to our departed minstrel we are in-debted to the feeling and genius of his admired contem-porary, Mr. Sotheby.—Ed. L. G.

E'en when Italia's treacherous gale Lured to the syren bay his sail, While round him breathed from every bower The fragrance of the orange flower, " Land of the mountain and the flood," Thy image still before him stood; And when life's sunshine was o'ercast, Ne'er from his dream that vision past.

His prayer was heard, to view once more, While death yet paused, his haunts of yore, Where Tweed his course romantic leads 'Mid Abbotsford's delightful meads, Or where the woods he planted spread Their grateful shadow o'er his head.

His prayer was heard—he sunk to rest Beneath that roof where life was blest, Sunk in their arms whose ceaseless care Watched o'er a father's silver hair. While his last look on them reposed. And death in peace his eyelid closed.

His prayer was heard: where Scott had birth, He rests within his native earth: There, in proud Dryburgh's sacred aisle, Raise, Scotland, his sepulchral pile: But not the sculptor's utmost art That to a rock can life impart-Tis Scott's imperishable page That spreads his fame from age to age: It needs not where his relics lie The pomp of idle eulogy— One word shall consecrate the stone, Bard of the North! thy name alone!

EXTRACTS

From the forthcoming Volume of Poems by Mr. Elliott, Author of "Corn-Law Rhymes."

LIGHT is around him, and the chime of streams; Bees hum o'er sallows yet; and in the brake, Coil'd like a chain of amethyst, the snake Basks on the bank, above the streamlet's flow. Oh, there are beauteous plumes, and many a bill.

And life, and love, beneath the ivy's bough! The swallow dips his purple in the rill, The lark sings in the cloud, and from the hill The blackbird's song replies.

The storm hath ceased. The sun is set: the trees

Are fain to slumber; and, on ocean's breast, How softly, yet how solemnly, the breeze, With unperceived gradation, sinks to rest! No voice, no sound is on the ear impress'd; Twilight is weeping o'er the pensive rose; The stoat slumbers, coil'd up in his nest;
The grossbeak on the owl's perch seeks repose;
And o'er the heights, behold! a pale light grows. Waked by the bat, up springs the startled snake.

The cloud's edge brightens-lo, the moon! and grove,

And tree, and shrub, bathed in her beams, With tresses cluster'd like the locks of love. Behold! the ocean's tremor, slowly move The cloud-like sails; and, as their way they

Fancy might almost deem she saw, above, The streamer's chasten'd hues: bright sleeps the surge,

And dark the rocks, on ocean's glittering verge. White billow, know'st thou Scotland? did thy wet Foot ever spurn the shell on her loved strand? There hast thou stoop'd, the sea-weed gray to fret-Or glaze the pebble with thy crystal hand? I am of Scotland. Dear to me the sand

That sparkles where my infant days were nursed!

Dear is the vilest weed of that wild land Where I have been so happy, so accursed! Oh, tell me, hast thou seen my lady stand Upon the moonlight shore, with troubled eye, Looking towards Norway? did'st thou gaze on her ?

And did she speak of one far thence, and sigh?

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

TALE OF A POST-OFFICE.

L. E. L. contributes two sweet poems to the Keepsake of this year; but we have selected, for variety's sake, a comic tale from her pen, called "One peep was enough," wherewith to enliven our pages this week.

"All places have their peculiarities: now that of Dalton was discourse—that species of discourse which Johnson's Dictionary entitles conversation on whatever does not concern ourselves.' Everybody knew what everybody did, and a little more. Eatings, drinkings, wakings, sleepings, walkings, talkings, sayings, doings,—all were for the good of the public; there was not such a thing as a secret in the town. There was a story of Mrs. Mary Smith, an ancient dame, who lived on an annuity, and boasted the gentility of a back and front parlour_that she once asked a few friends to din-The usual heavy antecedent half-hour really passed quite pleasantly; for Mrs. Mary's windows overlooked the market-place, and not a scrag of mutton could leave it unobserved; so that the extravagance or the meanness of the various buyers furnished a copious theme for dialogue. Still, in spite of Mr. A.'s pair of fowls, and Mrs. B.'s round of beef, the time seemed long, and the guests found hunger growing more potent than curiosity. They waited and waited; at length the fatal discovery took place-that in the hurry of observing her neighbours' dinners, Mrs. Smith had forgotten to order her own. It was in the month of March that an event happened which put the whole town in a commotion-the arrival of a stranger, who took up his abode at the White Hart: not that there was any thing remarkable about the stranger; he was a plain, middle-aged, respectable-looking man, and the nicest scrutiny (and Heaven knows how narrowly he was watched) failed to discover any thing odd about him. It was ascertained that he rose at eight, breakfasted at nine, ate two eggs and a piece of broiled bacon, sat in his room at the window, read a little, wrote a little, and looked out upon the road a good deal: he then strolled out, returned home, dined at five, smoked two cigars, read the Morning Herald (for the post came in of an evening), and went to bed at ten. Nothing could be more regular or unexceptionable than his habits; still it was most extraordinary what could have brought him to Dalton. were no chalybeate springs, warranted to cure every disease under the sun; no ruins in the neighbourhood, left expressly for antiquarians and pic-nic parties; no fine prospects, which, like music, people make it matter of conscience to admire; no celebrated person had ever been born or buried in its environs; there were no races, no assizes—in short, there was 'no nothing.' It was not even summer; so country air and fine weather were not the inducementa. The stranger's name was Mr. Williams-but that was the extent of their knowledge; and, shy and silent, there seemed no probability of learning any thing more from himself. Conjecture, like Shakespeare, 'exhausted worlds, was hiding from his creditors, others that he had committed forgery; one suggested that he had escaped from a mad-house, a second that he had killed some one in a duel: but all agreed that he came there for no good. It was the 23d of March, when a triad of gossips were assembled at their temple, the post-office. The affairs of Dalton and the nation were settled together: newspapers were slipped from their covers, and not an epistle but yielded a portion of its contents. But on this night all attention was concentrated upon one, directed to 'John Williams, Esq., at the White Hart, Dalton.' Eagerly was it compressed in the long fingers of Mrs. Mary Smith of dinnerless memory; the fat landlady of the White Hart was on tip-toe to peep; while the post-mistress, whose curiosity took a semblance of official dignity. raised a warning hand against any overt act of violence. The paper was closely folded, and closely written in a cramped and illegible hand; suddenly Mrs. Mary Smith's look grew more intent-she had succeeded in deciphering a sentence; the letter dropped from her hand. 'Oh, the monster!' shrieked the horrified peeper. Landlady and post-mistress both snatched at the terrible scroll, and they equally succeeded in reading the following words:-' We will settle the matter to-morrow at dinner; but I am sorry you persist in poisoning your wife-the horror is too great.' syllable more could they make out : but what they had read was enough. 'He told me,' gasped the landlady, 'that he expected a lady and gentleman to dinner—oh, the villain! to think of poisoning any lady at the White Hart; and his wife, too-I should like to see my husband poisoning me!' Our hostess became quite personal in her indignation. 'I always thought there was something suspicious about him; people don't come and live where nobody knows them, for nothing,' observed Mrs. Mary Smith. 'I daresay,' returned the post-mis-tress, 'Williams is not his real name.' 'I don't know that,' interrupted the landlady; 'Williams is a good hanging name: there was Williams who murdered the Marr's family. and Williams who burked all those poor dear children; I daresay he is some relation of theirs; but to think of his coming to the White Hart-it's no place for his doings, I can tell him: he sha'n't poison his wife in my house; out he goes this very night—I'll take the letter to him myself.' 'Lord! Lord! I shall be ruined, if it comes to be known that we take a look into the letters; and the post-mistress thought in her heart that she had better let Mr. Williams poison his wife at his leisure. Mrs. Mary Smith, too, reprobated any violent measures; the truth is, she did not wish to be mixed up in the matter; a gentlewoman with an annuity and a front and back parlour, was rather ashamed of being detected in such close intimacy with the post-mistress and the landlady. It seemed likely that poor Mrs. Williams would be left to her miserable fate. ' Murder will out,' said the landlord, the following morning, as he mounted the piebald pony, which, like Tom Tough, had seen a deal of service; and hurried off in search of Mr. Crampton, the nearest magistrate. Their perceptions assisted by brandy and water, he and his wife had sat up long past 'the witching hour of night,' deliberating on what line of conduct would be most efficacious in preserving the life of the unfortunate Mrs. Williams; and the result of their deliberation was to fetch the justice, and have the delinquent taken into quality for success. In both of these it poscustody at the very dinner-table which was sesses high claims to applause. The music, by fault of not articulating her words so as to be understood.

has ordered soup to-day for the first time; he thinks he could so easily slip poison into the liquid. There he goes; he looks like a man who has got something on his conscience. pointing to Mr. Williams, who was walking up and down at his usual slow pace. Two o'clock arrived, and with it a hack chaise; out of it stept, sure enough, a lady and gentleman. The landlady's pity redoubled—such a pretty young creature, not above nineteen! 'I see how it is,' thought she, 'the old wretch is jealous.' All efforts to catch her eye were in vain-the dinner was ready, and down they sat. The hostess of the White Hart looked alternately out of the window, like sister Ann, to see if any one was coming, and at the table to see that nothing was doing. To her dismay she observed the young lady lifting a spoonful of broth to her mouth! She could restrain herself no longer; but catching her hand. exclaimed, 'Poor dear innocent, the soup is poisoned!' All started from the table in confusion, which was yet to be increased:—a bustle was heard in the passage, in rushed a whole party, two of whom, each catching an arm of Mr. Williams, pinioned them down to his seat. 'I am happy, madam,' said the little bustling magistrate, to have been, under Heaven, the humble instrument of preserving your life from the nefarious designs of that disgrace to humanity.' Mr. Crampton paused in consequence of three wants—want of words, breath, and ideas. 'My life!' ejaculated the astonished lady. 'Yes, madam, the ways of Providence are inscrutable-the vain curiosity of three idle women has been turned to good account.' And the eloquent magistrate proceeded to detail the process of inspection to which the fatal letter had been subjected : but when he came to the terrible words-' We will settle the matter to-morrow at dinner; but I am sorry you persist in poisoning your wife'-he was interrupted by bursts of laughter from the gentleman, from the injured wife, and even from the prisoner himself. One fit of merriment was followed by another, till it became contagious, and the very constables began to laugh too. 'I can explain all,' at last interrupted the visitor. 'Mr. Williams came here for that quiet so necessary for the labours of genius: he is writing a melodrame called 'My Wife'—he submitted the last act to me, and I rather objected to the poisoning of the heroine. This young lady is my daughter, and we are on our way to the sea-coast. Mr. Williams is only wedded to the Muses.' The disconcerted magistrate shook his head, and muttered something about theatres being very immoral.
'Quite mistaken, sir,' said Mr. Williams.
'Our soup is cold; but our worthy landlady roasts fowls to a turn - we will have them and the veal cutlets up - you will stay and dine with us - and, afterwards, I shall be proud to read ' My Wife' aloud, in the hope of your approval, at least of your indulgence'— and with the same hope, I bid farewell to my readers."

DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

THE Doom Kiss, on its first representation on Monday, was, we discovered, "quite another thing" from the Court of Queen's Bench, being a drama of the serious German supernatural school, and depending more on fine music and beautiful scenery than on any other and then imagined new.' Some supposed he intended to be the scene of his crime. 'He | Bishop, does not strike us as being very original in its ideas, but it is the reminiscence of very pleasing thoughts, and mingled with new combinations, the general effects of which are truly gratifying. Occasionally, we should say the clang of accompaniment is too obstreperous. and this we must the more regret, when such a voice as that of Mr. H. Phillips, whose début it was, struggles in vain to be heard through the din. In other things we have only praise to bestow. The overture is above average; Phillips' first air extremely good; Bedford's drinking song capital; Miss Betts's song a charming composition, and Miss Cawse's not less so, though so opposite in style; and finally a sestetto, Bedford and five other male voices, admirable. The tenor in this concerted piece is one of the most delightful we ever heard. The scenery was very striking and splendid. The mountain of goblins and spirits, blasted and dangerous; the ruined abbey, solemn and magnificent; and the landscape, with lake and the domains of Arenberg, exquisite. It is almost impossible to believe that even Stanfield and his coadjutors could have produced so much excellence in five days, which we are assured is the case. The piece owns Mr. Pocock for its author.

Mr. Dowton has re-appeared here, with even more than his wonted and highly deserved popularity, as Mawworm in the Hypocrite, and also in the School for Scandal. With Jones restored to the other house, and Blanchard also returned, and about to débuter, we really seem to have hopes of the better days of comedy being

COVENT GARDEN.

AFTER Waverley on Wednesday, a new farce, called The Clutterbucks, or the Rail-road of Lore, also by Mr. Pocock, taken from the French piece Le Père d'Occasion, was produced; and with deserved success. Most of the materials are, indeed, of the conventional and long-established farce character; but these are skilfully handled, and, together with the novelties of incident. make a piece of sufficient originality, as well as liveliness and merriment. The rail-road has little business with the matter, except in bringing the dramatis persona as passengers to the scene of action. Capt. Dashall (F. Vining) and his rogue of a valet, Twist (Jones), arrive in quest of Miss Poozly (Miss Lee), who is also blest with a genuine out-and-outer of a lady'smaid, Kitty Carney (Mrs. Keeley). damsel, under the sanction of her father (Mr. F. Mathews) is contracted to Mr. Alexander Clutterbuck, junior (Keeley), son of a shipchandler, or some such thing, Alex. C. senior (Mr. Bartley); and the pair of citizens also appear from the rail-road conveyance in pursuance of the common object; but not before Dashall, in order to forward his views, has assumed the name, &c. of the younger Clutterbuck. Out of this assumption grow all the contrivances, contretems, and bustle of the farce; and they are so numerous and entertaining, that we will neither anticipate them nor occupy the space a detail would require, by telling how Clutterbuck and Son are set by the ears, and how the plot is wrought out to the desired and usual consummation—the union of the lovers, and the disappointment of the ridiculous pretender. But we will say that the acting was admirable. Jones in Twist was the perfection of the Scapin genus, and Mrs. Keeley a consort fit for him - the peerless of waiting-women.

Bartley, as a passionate citizen, was also excellent; and his son, Keeley, inimitably weak and ludicrous. Miss Lee was a very pretty heroine, and all the other parts ably sustained. The fun dustry and comfort is as well worth attention the same periods, the diminution was 513,697 never flagged; and hearty laughter through- as even "the spread of knowledge." out rewarded the efforts of author and performers. In a word, The Clutterbucks is as merry and effective a farce as has been brought out for many seasons.

On Tuesday evening Farquhar's comedy of the Beaux' Stratagem was performed at this theatre; and we very much question both the judgment and taste of those concerned in its revival. Vivacious in its action, replete with smartness verging even upon wit, and exhibiting perhaps the best specimen in our language of easy conversational dialogue, still the gross license of its own times is so thoroughly interwoven with its most brilliant qualities, as to render it irreclaimably unfit for present representation. In the declining state of the national theatres, not a customer should be lost; and as many are kept away by pieces of this and a similar tendency, the more seldom they are repeated the better.

The comedy was acted much too coarsely and broadly throughout; too great a straining for dramatic effect, particularly in the scene where Aimwell is wheeled in after his feigned accident. Some of our histrionic professors, unable to keep pace with genuine wit and humour when set down for them, seem to think noise and grimace a sufficient substitute. The personation of Archer by Jones was one of the most careful and highly-finished performances we have had the good luck for some time to witness. If one part had higher merit than another, it was perhaps in his first introduction to Mrs. Sullen and Dorinda, where the gentleman is allowed to creep out from beneath the livery. Mrs. Sullen, if to be acted at all, should be so by a married woman, for many reasons. We felt for Miss Tree in such a situation: she, however, shewed greater spirit than we have witnessed in her this season. She looks jaded. Surely it is not to the benefit of this establishment to impair the physical powers of this excellent actress by overwork. Keeley was amusing, as he always is; but Keeley is not Scrub. Miss Taylor, as the rosylipped Cherry, lisped with much naïveté, and had the good sense not to overact the character. Mr. Abbott, as Aimwell, introduced a new version of the fighting scene, in which he highly distinguished himself, though rather late in the field. Miss Sidney, as Dorinda, looked pretty; and some nameless person, as Lady Bountiful, acted most vilely.

Gibbet, Foigard, and the rest of the thieves and rogues, merited an earlier catastrophe than the one prepared for them in the comedy. The cast might be much improved by the substitution of Blanchard in the character of Sullen. and Meadows in that of Gibbet.

OLYMPIC.

Kill or Cure, another burletta from the ready pen of Mr. Charles Dance, has been performed here since Monday with considerable success. It is a lively, laughable thing, in which the matrimonial infelicities and squabblings of Mr. and Mrs. Brown are illustrated by the capital acting of Mrs. Orger and Liston.

VARIETIES.

Agricultural Employment Society.—His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex has consented to become the president of this equally benevolent have set up a periodical in Dublin, in which it and patriotic institution; the means resorted to is stated that 721,564 gallons of whisky less columns at the same time.

The Holy Cross .- We ought to have noticed Gazette, was read to the Society of Antiquaries on the 10th of February, 1831, and that a tolerably faithful outline of the paper appeared in the Literary Gazette of the 12th, which was copied into some of the daily papers.

Portrait of Sir Walter Scott .- We have seen the portrait of Sir W. Scott, after Lawrence, as it is in progress under the burin of J. H. Robinson; and we can truly attest that it bids fair to be an excellent likeness of the lamented Play-bills.-The play-bills are pretty constant sources of amusement. One of Drury Lane this week reads thus: "Ben Jonson. the lessee of this theatre, anxious to present the standard dramas of England," and announces the comedy of Every Man in his Humour, with a strong cast of characters.

Corn-Law Rhymes, &c .- We have a portrait of the author of these poems on our table, en-graved, we presume, (for no explanation accompanies it,) as a frontispiece to his new volume. It is engraved by A. Duncan, and has a striking expression of countenance.

Price One Penny. - No. I. The Ladies' Weekly Fashions and Journal of Elegance. Such is the title of a new contemporary, containing coloured prints of half-a-dozen headdresses, one page, and two of their wearers grouped on another, with a cover, explanatory of the fashions in female dress. How this and the rest of the penny publications can go on, even for a season, puzzles calculation; but we have only to notice them as part of the signs of, we fear, the literary declension of the times.

Goethe and Schiller. - Among the MSS. left by Goethe are about five hundred letters of a correspondence between him and the illustrious Schiller: this treasure is deposited with the authorities of Weimar.

Old Oak.-The oak, a thousand years old. Le Cercle tells us), at Skarsine, Breslau, was destroyed by fire on the 2d of September. It burnt from six till eleven o'clock with great brilliancy, and at last fell with a terrible crash, crushing to death one of the inhabitants of Krakowahue, whom curiosity had attracted too near this flaming monarch of the wood. Only a trunk of thirty feet in height remains to mark where this prodigy of the vegetable world was the admiration of so many ages.

China. — The present Emperor of China, who employs his leisure hours in literary pursuits, is now superintending the printing of a familiar, or conversational dictionary, in the Chinese language, which it is calculated will extend to the enormous number of 168 thousand volumes; 2,708 persons are constantly employed in editing this work. An old Chinese Encyclopædia is extant, consisting of 6000 volumes, of which 68 alone are devoted to Pun.-A party the other day in Gorhambury Park went to look at the ancient abode of Sir Nicholas Bacon, a ruin of the age of Henry or Elizabeth, when one inquired, "Is there any entrance to see the interior?" To which a punster replied, " To be sure there must be, for it is Two-door architecture !'

Irish Temperance. — The temperance people by which to ameliorate the condition of the were drank in Ireland during the first six poorer classes have been attended by the best months of 1831, than during the parallel results wherever employed. The spread of in- months of 1830; and that in Scotland, during Potato-Wine. - A retired French officer at that Lord Mahon's History of the Holy Cross, Forges, department of the Mense, has, it is extracted from the Amulet for 1833, in our last stated, succeeded in extracting a vinous spirit from the potato, out of which he can imitate Muscat and other wines.

Iron Rail-roads in France.-The projects for these modern improvements embrace railways from the capital to Rouen and Havre; to Lisle, with branches to Calais, Dunkirk, and Valenciennes; to Strasburgh, with a branch to Metz; to Lyons and Marseilles, with a branch to Grenoble; to Bordeaux; and to Tours and Nantes. We know not whether this magnificent and important scheme is likely to be carried into execution.

Pump .- An engineer at Strasburg, we observe, claims great merit for inventing a pump which throws the water eighty feet in height. What would the good folks say if they saw one of Mr. Braithwaite's fire-engines?

LITERARY NOVELTIES.

"We esteem and recommend it. Every subject of interest connected with this delightful science is treated of in the clearest manner."—London Weekly Review.

"Every thing is here written up to the latest date, and the work cannot fail, we think, of being found eminently useful. The more important facts are exhibited with remarkable clearness, and the author has completely succeeded in supplying the defects of Mr. Parkes's book."—Monthly Magasiaw.

"The necessity of a clear, progressive view of chemistry is obvious, and the want of such a treatise has long been felt by students. Dr. Graham has well supplied the want. His book is systematic and comprehensive, perspicuous in its plan, and extensive in its compass. Unlike former analyses, it does not confound and complicate the various parts of the science, but ascends from the first principles and simple elements to the compound and illustrative branches of the study." Our Subscribers will perceive that we have this month issued a Double Number of Regina. The causes which have induced us to take this step will, we are sure, be as satisfactory to them as to our celves. Hitherto, owing to our having commenced the Magazine upon a February, we have been obliged, most subscribers and commencing the succession with February, instead of terminating regulations that the one year, and commencing the succeeding solume with the its successor with February, instead of terminating regulations that the one year, and commencing the succeeding solume with the its successor with February, instead of terminating regulations that the one year, and commencing the succeeding solume with the its successor with February, instead of terminating regulations that the double one of the value of the incompanies of the processor of the processor. The present volume of Regina will, therefore, although it only embraces tive months, contain, as usual, six Numbers; and we trust that the double one now issued for the purole to talk of what they will do hereafter. The best way is to try them by their past deeds, by which standard on the desire to be estimated. At the same time, without curring the charge of preumption, we hope we may say, that as the Magazine has been progressively improving in excellence, we are indulging in no very rash degree of validination when a profits of which declaration we trust way shall be able to give in the very first Number we publish. Having said these we were work, we have nothing farther to add, than to wish our subscribers all manner of health and happiness, and to assure them, for their comfort, that Reginals's alse is increasing rapidly, in spite of bad times, open and concealed foes, and opposition unparalleled in literary annals. Indeed, we believe we state no more than the truth when we say, that at this moment ours is the only Magazine in London — or we believe as is increasing rapidly, in spite of bad times, open addition. REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

speak of the literary accompaniment of Mr. Heath's beautiful productions. The novelty and originality of his design distinguishes the present volume from all the other Annuals; and we cannot but think that the idea of presenting so many varied specimens of female beauty will go far to outstrip all competition in this class of publication. At least, for ourselves, much as we delight to look upon the gorgeous or natural landscapes of a Turner, a Stanfield, or a Harding-much as we admire the imaginative productions of a Howard, a Martin, or a Corbould-much as we like the characteristic or merry groups of familiar life, in which so many of our artists excel-yet cannot we but feel gratification of a more enchanting kind him. No where are the many contrasts in the when we contemplate the human face divine, appearance of our metropolis more strikingly in the fairest of all its aspects, the most touching of all its expressions, the most deliciously bewildering and dangerous of all its possible existences the matchless and captivating lineaments of woman's countenance, the grace and

L. E. L.; and the exquisite taste and talent House, whose depths they seemed vainly striving which she has displayed in answering the call, prove how well justified was the choice. It is, as we have remarked on a former occasion, extremely difficult for an author to write successfully even upon a single given subject more difficult still to write on many proposed, however various-and, need we say how intensely that difficulty must be increased when to number is added identity of species. These engravings are all fancied portraits of beautiful women; and it was required to compose a narrative which should give life and reality to them all. And admirably has this been accomplished, both in prose and verse—of the former seven, and of the latter ten pieces, but the poetry not occupying thirty pages altogether.

It is not easy to pick from so rich and various loveliness of her peerless form.

a wreath a specimen of flowers which can convey a just notion of its qualities, whether (we care not for our mixed metaphor) the bloom of its fancy, the fragrance of its thoughts, or the essence of its mentally medicinal virtues. We can only state our opinion, that it is well calculated to charm the fancy and touch the heart, and to furnish a refined intellectual treat to every reader capable of feeling and appreciating the truth and excellence of literature.

The first tale, the " Enchantress," occupying a fifth of the volume, is one of powerful imagining; and we regret that we must pass it over for the "Talisman," as more eligible for a quotation. The Talisman is an interesting over them, as if in encouragement: I here story of an individual whose days are numbered take the last lesson of my destiny. I have by the gratification of his wishes, and who sees | chosen the wrong side of the river-forced upon | to the clock striking! Alas! how emblematic water at your feet, a stomach-pump in your flannel, and a respectable member of the Humane Society watching the first moment of returning consciousness, in order to point out the horror of your crime! No, no—not now, with witnesses and succour at hand; but in the dark night, when the stars alone behold prophesied, then shall the waters, gloomy as the life they close, give me that repose-death. Content with this determination, he gladly allowed his attention to fix on the scene before assembled than in the view from Waterloo Bridge. As yet the sunshine, which produces the deep shadows deeper for its own brightness, was only prophesied by the clear gray light that brought out every object in the same dim but distinct atmosphere. The large pale lamps To illustrate this justly named Book of were not yet extinguished; but they gave no Beauty the artist has evoked the genius of light, save to the dark arches of Somerset to penetrate. Somerset House conveys the idea of a Venetian palace; its Corinthian pillars, its walls rising from the waters, its deep arches, fitting harbours for the black gondola, the lion sculptured in the carved arms—all realises the picture which the mind has of those marble homes where the Foscarini and the Donati dwelt, in those days when Venice was at her height of mystery and magnificence. The other side is, on the contrary, just the image of a Dutch town; the masses of floating planks, the low tile-covered buildings, the crowded warehouses—mean, dingy, but full of wealth and industry—are the exact semblance of the towns which, like those of the haughty bride of the Adriatic, rose from the very bosom of the deep-Amsterdam and Venice. The history of the Italians is picturesque and chivalric; but that of the Dutch has always seemed to me the beau idéal of honourable industry, rational exertion, generally enjoyed liberty. and all strong in more than one brave defence. He does not deserve to read history, who does not enjoy the gallant manner in which they beat back Louis XIV. 'The two banks of the river embody the English nation,' thought Charles; 'there is its magnificence and its poetry, its terraces, its pillars, and its carved emblazonings; and on the other is its trade, its industry, its warehouses, and their many signs of skill and toil. Ah! the sun is rising his life ebbing by the gradual disappearance of a piece of shagreen skin, by which his span is life? The river became at every instant more measured. He goes to Waterloo Bridge to beautiful; long lines of crimson light trembled commit suicide, and we copy the graphic pictin the stream; fifty pointed spires glittered in ture both of external objects and of the internal the bright air, each marking one of those sacred ings; from Drawings by the first Artists.

12mo. pp. 264. London, Longman and Co.;
Philadelphia, Wardle.

In this part of our journal we have only to over, to find yourself roused from that stupor shrine, fit for the thanksgiving of a mighty which had been even as death, by bottles of hot people. As yet, the many houses around lay in unbroken repose: the gardens of the Temple mouth, an old woman rubbing you down with looked green and quiet, as if far away in some lonely valley; and the few solitary trees scattered among the houses seemed to drink the fresh morning air and rejoice. 'How strong is the love of the country in all indwellers of towns!' exclaimed Charles. 'How many the dark night, when the stars alone behold creepers, shutting out the dark wall, can I see what their shining records may long since have from this spot! how many pots of brightcoloured and sweet-scented plants, are carefully nursed in windows, which, but for them, would be dreary indeed! And yet even here is that wretched inequality in which fate delights alike in the animate and inanimate world. What have those miserable trees and shrubs done, that they should thus be surrounded by an unnatural world of brick-the air, which is their life, close and poisoned, and the very rain, which should refresh them, but washing down the soot and dust from the roofs above; and ail this, when so many of their race flourish in the glad and open fields, their free branches sprending to the morning dews and the summer showers, while the earliest growth of violets springs beneath their shade? He turned discontentedly to the other side of the bridge.

Beautiful! was his involuntary ejaculation. The waves were freighted as if with Tyrian purple, so rich was the sky which they mir-rored: the graceful arches of Westminster Bridge stretched lightly across, and, shining like alabaster, rose the carved wells of the fine old Abbey, where sleep the noblest of England's dead. Honour to the glorious past!—how it honoured us! Once we were the future, and how much was done for our sake! The contrast between above and below the bridge is very striking. Below, all seems for use, except Somerset House—and even that, when we think, is but a superb office—and the Temple gardens: all is crowded, dingy, and commercial. Above, wealth has arrived at luxury; and the grounds behind Whitehall, the large and ornamental houses, have all the outward signs of rank and riches. Charles turned sullenly from them, and watched the boats now floating with the tide. As yet few were in motion; the huge barges rested by the banks, but two or three colliers came on with their large black sails, and darkened the glistening river as they passed. At this moment the sweet chimes of St. Bride struck five, and the sound was immediately repeated by the many clocks on every side: for an instant the air was filled with music. 'Curious it is,' murmured our hero, that every hour of our day is repeated from myriad chimes; and yet how rarely do we attend is this of the way in which we neglect the all differing from the ordinary apparel of daily many signs of time! How terrible, when we think of what time may achieve, is the manner in which we waste it! At the end of every man's life, at least three-quarters of the mighty element of which that life was composed will be found void—lost—nay, utterly forgotten! And yet that time, laboured and husbanded. might have built palaces, gathered wealth, and, still greater, made an imperishable name.

There is also a capital description of Covent Garden Market, but we have not room for it; and we will not, by extract, anticipate aught of the dénouement of the story. The "Knife" is a tale of murder, trial, and death; which we merely mention as a novelty, of much pathos, from the pen of our fair writer; and shall transcribe but à few passages as examples in a different style.

"Death never excites such sympathy as it does when it assumes the shape of murder. In a few days the little garden was stripped of every plant, rosemary, rue, currant, and gooseberry bush, potato and cabbage, -all that their possessors might have some relic of ' the horrible murder; and every one planted the spoil in the most conspicuous part of their own The poor old woman had been unigarden. versally liked; she had kept that shop forty years; nothing had induced her to leave it, though the original motive for settling there had long passed away. The 'Great House,' as it was wont to be called, where she had lived servant, and which had once been scarcely twice a stone's throw from her home, had since been pulled down. Mrs. Bird had for many years been the sole chronicler of the glories of the old family;' and her former connexion with it gave her still something of consequence in the eyes of her neighbours. The most scrupulous honesty, a cheerful temper, and a great love for children (a singularly popular quality), a regular attendance at church (on fine Sundays in the bright red shawl, on wet ones in a less bright red cloak), and a naturally good understanding, made her beloved, and her advice often both asked and taken. complained of the distance of her shop, but no one thought of going to another. All respected the feeling that made the old woman cling to the spot which had witnessed her youth, her marriage, and her old age. She had wedded, early in life, one of the gardeners of the 'Great House,' who, to use that common but most expressive phrase, had turned out 'no better than he should do.' Luckily, going home one night in a state of intoxication, he broke his neck an event Mrs. Bird deplored much more than her neighbours thought necessary. However, it was not that sort of grief which requires consolation; and the widow was not tempted to forget the miseries of her first marriage in the happiness of a second. She never gave hope that triumph over experience, which Dr. Johnson so ungallantly declares a second wedding to be. Years after years rolled away, and Mrs. Bird and her shop seemed as much part of the moor as the stunted furze-bushes. one dreamt of change till the morning of the murder, and then, as we have said, every body had foreseen what the old woman's living by herself, in such an out-of-the-way place, would

"At length the day of trial arrived. Assuredly the English trial for murder is an awful assembling; the vague look of serious horror, which would be ludicrous under any other circumstances, is here redeemed by its fearful source. The grave costume of the bar, the dignified solemnity of the judge, the long robes, life, have their full effect on at least two-third of the spectators. Some may be too thoughtful. others too thoughtless, to have their imagina-tion affected by all this 'pomp of circumstance;' but this is far from being the feeling of the generality. The court was crowded at an unusually early hour. Gradually the dense and silent mass gave way before the slow approach of the judge: he took his seat; the twelve jurymen followed—there was a slight stir as each one settled in his place, and then all was quiet as the grave. There is a deep impression of awe produced by such a vast but silent crowd : we are at once conscious that the cause is terrible which can induce the unusual stillness. The issue of a trial on which hangs life or death, is indeed an appalling thing. know that men are about to take away that which they cannot give - that a few words of human breath will deprive of breath one of the number for ever; and though we acknowledge that in this evil world punishment is the only security against crime, and that blood for blood has been a necessity from the beginning of time; still, we feel that the necessity is a dreadful one.

"The prisoners were now required to plead guilty or not guilty. ' Not guilty!' replied the kipsy, with an air of mingled confidence and defiance. His wife had not till that moment been aware of his presence. At the first tone of his voice, she sprang forward with a cry and look of intense delight, and throwing herself at his feet, embraced his knees, while joy and affection found vent in a passionate burst of tears. The gipsy seemed the least moved of any by the touching love of his wife; he rather suffered than returned her caresses, receiving them more as homage is accepted, than as fondness is requited. How incomprehensible is woman's love !-it is not kindness that wins it. nor return that ensures it; we daily see the most devoted attachment lavished on those who seem to us singularly unworthy. The Spectator shewed his usual knowledge of human nature, when, in speaking on this subject, he relates, that in a town besieged by the enemy, on the women being allowed to depart with whatever they held most precious, only one among them carried off her husband, -a man notorious for his tyrannical temper, and who had, moreover, a bad - or, as it turned out, a good - habit of beating his wife every morning. Well, all governments are maintained by fear—fear being our great principle of action; and fear, we are tempted to believe, heightens and strengthens the love of woman."

"Theresa" is a narrative, the novelty of whose plot would be spoilt by reference to parts; and we accordingly venture to supply their place by quoting entire the following poem, entitled "Meditation."

m, entitled "Meditation."

"A awest and melanchely face, that seems Haunied with earnest thought; the dark midaight Has given its taven softness to her hair; And evening, starry eve, half clouds, half light, Is in the shadowy beauty of her syes. How quietly has Night come down, Quiet as the sweet sleep she yields! A purple shadow marks yon town, A silvery huse the moonlit fields; And one or two white turrets rise Glittering beneath the highest ray—As conscious of the distant skies,

To which they teach and point the way. The river in the lustre gleams,

Where hang the blossomed shrubs above—The flushed and drooping rose, whose dreams Must be of summer and of lova.

The pale acacia's fragrant bough Is heavy with its weight of dew; And every flower and leaf have now A sweeter sigh, a deeper hue.

There breathes no song, there stirs no wing—Mute is the blod and evel till the beau.

There breathes no song, there stirs no wing— Mute is the bird, and still the bee;

Only the wind is wandering—
Wild Wind, is there no rest for thee?
Oh. wanderer over many flowers,
Have none of them for thee repose?
Go sleep amid the lime-tree bowers,
Go rest by yon white gelder-rose. What! restless still? methinks thou art What! restless still? methinks thou Fated for a ye to bear along. The beating of the poet's heart, The sorrow of the poet's song. Or has thy voice before been heard, The language of another sphere, And every tone is but a word Mournful, because forgotten here? Mournful, because torgotten here?

Some memory, or some sympathy,
Is surely in thy murmur brought:
Ah, all in vain the search must be,
To pierce these mysterles of thought!
They say that, hung in ancient halls,
At midnight from the silent lute
A melancholy music falls
From chords which were by daylight mute. And so the human heart by night
Is touched by some inspired tone,
Harmonious in the deep delight,
By day it knew not was its own.
Those stars upon the clear blue heaven—
Those stars we never see by day—
Have in their hour of beauty given
A deeper influence to their sway— Felt on the mind and on the soul-Fett on the mind and on the soul—
For is it not in such an hour
The spirit spurns the clay's control,
And genius knows its glorious power?—
All that the head may c'er command,
All that the heart can ever feel,
The tuneful lip, the girted hand,
Such hours inspire, such hours reveal. Such hours inspire, such hours reveal.
The morrow comes with noise and toil,
The meaner cares, the hurried crowd,
The culture of the barren soil,
And gain the only wish avowed:
The hope which then in light had birth,
The flushing cheek, the kindling eye,
Are with the common things of earth.

Are with the common things of earth.

Yet all their influence is not gone:
Perchance in that creative time
Some high attraction first was known,
Some aim and energy sublime.
In such an hour doth sculptor know
What shapes within the marble sleep;
His Sun-god lifts the radiant bow,
His Venus rises from the deep,

And imaged on the saure sir And imaged on the azure air
The painter marks his shadows rise—
A face than mortal face more fair,
And colours which are of the skies.
The hero sees the field his own,
The banners sweep o'er glittering spears,
And in the purple and the throne
Forgets their cost of blood and tears.

And he who gave to Europe's sight
Her sister world till then unseen,
How long to his inspired night
Familiar must that world have been!
All Genius ever yet combined,
In its first hour could only seem,
And rose embodied in the mind From some imaginative dream.

From some imaginative dream.

O beauty of the midnight skies!
O mystery of each distant star!
O dreaming hours, whose magic liee
In rest and calm, with Dey afar!
Thanks for the higher moods that wake
Our thoughtful and immortal part!—
Out on our life, could we not make
A spiritual temple of the heart!"

Of "Rebecca"-a tale of the time of Charles the Second, which introduces Lee the poet in a very affecting manner—the finale is powerfully tragic, and reminds us of Kenilworth. "Experiments" is in a lighter strain, and gives the adventures of a "lover from ennui." It is piquant, and shews great observation of life. We take a Brighton fancy ball sketch as a sample.

"Now, a fancy ball is bad enough in London, where milliners are many, and where theatres have costumes that may be borrowed or copied; but in the country, where people are left to their own devices—truly to them may be applied the old poet's account of murderers, 'their fancies are all frightful.' Miss Temple, we need scarcely observe, wore a turban, and looked as oriental, at least as un-English, as possible. Elizabeth preferred going back upon the taste of her grandmothers; and when Cecil first saw her standing in the window, with the lose hanging sleeves of former days, and floating draperies of an antique striped silk-her pretty arms just bare to the elbow, and her fair hair in half-dishevelled curls,—he decided, that if you are very young and pretty, extravagance in costume carries its own excuse. To the dance they went: the dancing was bad, the music worse, and instead of ice, sago was handed round to keep the young people from taking cold. Yet Cecil had passed worse evenings. We talk of unsophisticated nature-I should like to know where it is to be found. Elizabeth Temple's hair did curl naturally-she made her own dresses-and for accomplishments, played on her grandmother's spinnet by ear, knitted purses, and took the housekeeping alternate weeks with her sister;—yet had she talents for flirtation at least equal to those of any young lady whose dress and accomplishments are the perfection of milliners and May Fair. Cecil was her partner the most of the evening; and, by a few ingenious and invidious parallels, implied, not expressed, between him and the other cavaliers,—that preference of attention, the best of feminine flattery,—and a deference to his opinion, nicely blended with a self-consciousness of prettiness, Elizabeth contrived to keep him rather pleasantly awake. Mr. Temple's house lay in his way home; and though he had already ate supper enough for six months, his friends would make him go in for another. On his departure, Elizabeth gave him some trifling commission at Hastings; and while she was writing it down, Forrester, with that universal habit of the idle, took up whatever happened to be near, in the laudable intention of twisting it to pieces. It was the little green silk purse, and he looked on it with a remembrance of the slender fingers he had seen employed in its making. Could he be mistaken? No, he saw the letters distinctly, C. F. worked in light brown hair his own initials; and he now recollected that Miss Temple had asked him the other morning what was his Christian name; on hearing which, she made the usual remark of young ladies in such cases, 'Dear, what a beautiful name!' Elizabeth, turning round at this minute, saw the purse in his hand, and also which of the stitches had fixed his attention. Blushing even deeper than the occasion required, she said in a low but hurried voice, 'I really cannot have my work spoilt; give me the purse, Mr. Forrester.' 'Never! said Cecil, in what was for him a very energetic 'Oh, but I must and will have it!' making an attempt to snatch it from himto which his only answer was to catch her hand and kiss it. 'Elizabeth, my dear, Mr. Forrester must be tired; do not detain him with your foolish commissions,' said her father, who advanced, and himself accompanied his guest to the hall, taking leave of him with a mysterious look of mingled cordiality and compas-The young gentleman rode home, too sion. tired for any thing but sleep; and when he arose the next morning, it was with a conviction that light brown hair was an excellent thing in a woman."

We will only let out so much of the secret as to tell that the initials were not his, after all, but those of a more favoured lover.

A portrait designated "Lucy Ashton," gives rise to the subjoined story, told by an old crone to "amuse" the heroine, in an ancient gloomy chamber, by night, when her spirit is most depressed.

" 'Many, many years ago there was a fair peasant—so fair, that from her childhood all Suddenly she stopped in fear—it was so gloomy nor hell should keep me from your side!' And her friends prophesied it could lead to no good. around; the steep banks nearly closed over-

When she came to sixteen, the Count Ludolf | head, and the boughs of the old pines which thought it was a pity such beauty should be | stood in some of the tempest-cleft hollows met thought it was a pity such beauty should be wasted, and therefore took possession of it: better that the lovely should pine in a castle than flourish in a cottage. Her mother died broken-hearted; and her father left the neighbourhood, with a curse on the disobedient girl who had brought desolation to his hearth, and shame to his old age. It needs little to tell that such a passion grew cold—it were a long tale that accounted for the fancies of a young, rich, and reckless cavalier; and, after all, no-thing changes so soon as love.' 'Love!' murmured Lucy, in a low voice, as if unconscious of the interruption; 'Love, which is our fate, like fate must be immutable: how can the heart forget its young religion?' 'Many,' pursued the sibyl, 'can forget, and do and will forget. As for the count, his heart was cruel with prosperity, and selfish with good fortune; he had never known sickness which softenssorrow which brings all to its own levelpoverty which, however it may at last harden the heart, at first teaches us our helplessness. What was it to him that Bertha had left the home which could never receive her again? What, that for his sake she had submitted to the appearance of disgrace which was not in reality her's ?--for the peasant-girl was proud as the baron; and when she stept over her father's threshold, it was as his wife. Well, well, he wearied, as men ever weary of woman's complaining, however bitter may be the injury which has wrung reproach from the unwilling lip. Many a sad hour did she spend weeping in the lonely tower, which had once seemed to her like a palace; for then the radiance of love was around it-and love, forsooth, is something like the fairies in our own land; for a time it can make all that is base and worthless seem most glittering and precious. Once, every night brought the ringing horn and eager step of the noble hunter; now, the nights passed away too often in dreary and unbroken splendour. Yet the shining steel of the shield in the hall, and the fair current of the mountainspring, shewed her that her face was lovely as ever. One evening he came to visit her; and his manner was soft, and his voice was low, as in the days of old. Alas! of late she had been accustomed to the unkind look and the harsh word. 'It is a lovely twilight, my Bertha,' said he; 'help me to unmoor our little bark and we will sail down the river.' With a light step, and yet lighter heart, she descended the rocky stairs, and reached the boat before her companion. The white sail was soon spread... they sprang in, and the slight vessel went rapidly through the stream. At first the waves were crimson, as if freighted with rubies, the last love-gifts of the dying sun-for they were sailing on direct to the west, which was one flush, like a sea of blushing wine. Gradually the tints became paler; shades of soft pink just tinged the far-off clouds, and a delicate lilac fell on the waters. A star or two shone pure and bright in the sky, and the only shadows were flung by a few wild rose-trees that sprang from the clefts of the rocks. By degrees the drooping flowers disappeared; the stream grew narrower, and the sky became darker; a few soft clouds soon gathered into a storm: but Bertha heeded them not; she was too earnestly engaged in entreating her hus-band that he would acknowledge their secret marriage. She spoke of the dreary solitude to which she was condemned; of her wasted youth, worn by the fever of continual anxiety.

in the air, and cast a darkness like that of night upon the rapid waters, which hurried on as if they distrusted their gloomy passage. At this moment Bertha's eye caught the ghastly paleness of her husband's face, terribly distinct: she thought that he feared the rough torrent, and for her sake; tenderly she leant towards him—his arm grasped her waist, but not in love; he seized the wretched girl and flung her overboard, with the very name of God upon her lips, and appealing, too, for his sake!
Twice her bright head.—Bertha had ever gloried in her sunny curls, which now fell in wild profusion on her shoulders-twice did it emerge from the wave; her faint hands were spread abroad for help; he shrunk from the last glare of her despairing eyes; then a low moan; a few bubbles of foam rose on the stream; and all was still-but it was the stillness of death. An instant after, the thunder-cloud burst above, the peal reverberated from cliff to cliff, the lightning clave the black depths of the stream, the billows rose in tumultuous eddies; but Count Ludolf's boat cut its way through, and the vessel arrived at the open river. No trace was there of storm; the dewy wild flowers filled the air with their fragrance; and the moon shone over them pure and clear, as if her light had no sympathy with human sorrow, and shuddered not at human crime. And why should she? We might judge her by ourselves; what care we for crime in which we are not involved, and for suffering in which we have no part? The red wine-cup was drained deep and long in Count Ludolf's castle that night; and soon after, its master travelled afar into other lands -there was not pleasure enough for him at home. He found that bright eyes could gladden even the ruins of Rome—but Venice became his chosen city. It was as if revelry delighted in the contrast which the dark robe, the gloomy canal, and the death-black gondola, offered to the orgies which made joyous her midnights.' 'And did he feel no remorse?' asked Lucy. Remorse!' said the crone, with a scornful laugh; 'remorse is the word for a child, or for a fool—the unpunished crime is never regretted. We weep over the consequence, not over the fault. Count Ludolf soon found another love. This time his passion was kindled by a picture, but one of a most strange and thrilling beauty -a portrait, the only unfaded one in a deserted palace situate in the eastern lagune. Day after day he went to gaze on the exquisite face and the large black eyes, till they seemed to answer to his own. But the festival of San Marco was no time for idle fantasies; and the Count was among the gayest of the revellers. Amid the many masks which he followed, was one that finally rivetted his attention. Her light step seemed scarcely to touch the ground, and every now and then a dark curl or two of raven softness escaped the veil: at last the mask itself alipped aside, and he saw the countenance of his beautiful incognita. He addressed her; and her answers, if brief, were at least encouraging; he followed her to a gondola, which they entered together. It stopped at the steps of the palace he had supposed deserted. 'Will you come with me?' said she, in a voice whose melancholy was as the lute when the night-wind wakens its music; and as she stood by the sculptured lions which kept the entrance, the moonlight fell on her lovely face—lovely as if Titian had painted it. 'Could you doubt?' said Ludolf, as he caught the extended hand; 'neither heaven

The waxen tapers burned in their golden candlesticks, the lamps were fed with perfumed oil, and many a crystal vase was filled with rare flowers, till the atmosphere was heavy with fragrance. Piled up, in mother-ofpearl baskets, the purple grapes had yet the morning dew upon them; and the carved pine reared its emerald crest beside peaches, like topazes in a sunset. The Count and the lady beyond the mere enumeration of ancestry, alseated themselves on a crimson ottoman; one white arm, leant negligently, contrasted with the warm colour of the velvet; but extending the other towards the table, she took a glass; at her sign the Count filled it with wine. 'Will you pledge me?' said she, touching the cup with her lips, and passing it to him. He drank it -for wine and air seemed alike freight- of Norfolk, mentioned in a deed anno 1206, ed with the odour of her sigh. 'My beauty!' exclaimed Ludolf, detaining the ivory hand. With this our review ends; and we consign the Book of Beauty (so beautiful in every respect) to the universal popularity it so richly merits.

A Genealogical and Heraldic History of the Commoners of Great Britain and Ireland, &c. &c. By John Burke, Esq. author of the "Dictionaries of the Peerage and Baronetage," &c. 8vo. Lond. 1832. Bentley. Tuis is the beginning of a very curious work, the materials for which must have been collected during a long period, and with great pains and industry. The family histories of many of our ancient commoners are as important in a public point of view, and as interesting in domestic annals, as those of the highest peers of the land; and yet we know nothing of them, except here and there from incidental and, arduous as it is, we trust the aid of individuals in possession of the requisite data will enable him to carry it to as commendable a conclusion as his preceding genealogical la-

Yet, highly as we estimate the zeal and ability of the writer, we hardly know how to introduce his present performance to our readers, so that they may confirm our opinion. To quote family trees is impossible, and to lop off branches, by way of sample, unnatural. We will, however, try to extract something liances, number of wives and children, and other matters of private concernment. We other matters of private concernment. select Mr. Coke of Norfolk as a specimen:

" The family of Coke, from which Mr. Coke derives through female descent, and which he now represents, is deduced by Camden from William Coke, of Doddington, in the county who was father, by his wife Felice, of Geoffrey Coke, of Doddington, from whom descended Sir Edward Coke, the celebrated lawyer. This eminent person, the son of Robert Coke, Esq., of Mileham, in the county of Norfolk, and Winifred, his wife, daughter and one of the heirs of William Knightley, of Morgraveto the grammar-school at Norwich, whence he removed to Trinity College, Cambridge, where brity, that he very soon attained considerable practice. About this period he married Bridget, Huntingfield Hall, in the county of Suffolk, third son of Sir William Paston, of Paston, as wealth. The cities of Coventry and Norwich soon after elected him their recorder. The county of Norfolk returned him to parliabeth (1592), Mr. Coke was appointed solicitor, and the next year attorney-general. In 1603 he received the honour of knighthood from King James I. at Greenwich; and in three years afterwards was elevated to the bench as chief of the Court of Common Pleas, from which he was advanced in 1613 to the dignity of Chief Justice of England (being the last person who bore that title), and sworn of the privy council. His lordship incurred subsequently, however, the displeasure of the court : and, while in disgrace, hearing that a noble lord had solicited from the crown a portion of the lands belonging to the church at Norwich, which he had recovered, and settled thereon, he cautioned the peer to desist, or that he would resume his gown and cap, and come into Westminster Hall once again to plead the cause of the church. Between his paternal property, the great marriage-portion he had with his wife, and his valuable offices and lucrative practice at the bar, Sir Edward Coke realised an estate so ample, that each of his sons possessed a fortune equal to that of an elder brother.

none ever applied himself closer to the study of the law, so never did any one understand it better: of which he fully convinced England by his excellent administration for many years together, whilst attorney-general, and by executing the office of Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas with the greatest wisdom and prudence. Nor did he give less proof of his abilities in his excellent Reports and commentaries upon our laws, whereby he has highly obliged both his own age and posterity.' His lordship died 3d September, 1633, at the advanced age of eighty-three. A noble monument was erected to his memory at Tittleshall church, Norfolk, with his effigies habited in judge's robes, lying at full length."

The Congreve family is also a good speci-

"William Congreve, Esq., of Aldermanston, in the county of Berks, and of Congreve, in the county of Stafford, married Mary, daughter and co-heiress of Sir William Pepperrell, Bart. This family, one of the most eminent in the county of Stafford, was settled at Congreve soon after the Conquest, and thence derived its surname. Richard Congreve, Esq. of Congreve, was one of the thirteen Staffordshire gentlemen upon whom King Charles II. intended to have conferred the order of the royal oak, were the institution of such a degree of knighthood pergrandaughter of Sir Anthony Fitz-Herbert, the eminent judge, by whom he had two sons, 1. John, his successor. 2. William, a colonel in the army, father of William Congreve, the celebrated dramatist, born in 1672. This distinguished person is spoken of in terms of admiration by every English writer who has had occasion to mention his name. Steele made him the patron of his miscellany, and Pope inscribed to him the translation of the Iliad. Placed by circumstances beyond the pecuniary anxieties of an author's profession, he is said to have affected contempt for the profession itself. The anecdote of his telling Voltaire, when he came to visit him, that he desired to be considered as a gentleman solely, and not in the light of an author, is one of the mortifying proofs that the highest gifted minds are not always the strongest. The latter years of Congreve's life were rendered miserable by sickness and infirmity. Catarrhs in his eyes produced at length total blindness, and repeated attacks of gout prematurely undermined his constitution. He sought relief from the waters at Bath; but the accident of being overturned in his carriage, left a permanent pain in his side, and probably accelerated his death, which occurred in January 1729, in the sixtieth year of his age. The remains of the poet were in-terred with great solemnity in Westminster Abbey; and Henrietta, duchess of Marlborough, erected a monument to his memory. To this lady, who is said to have entertained a most romantic regard for him, he bequeathed the great bulk of his fortune. Congreve's occasional poems are so far below mediocrity, that we have not deemed it necessary at all to allude w them. As a dramatist, his fame is imperishable; and he stands, if not at the head, in the very first class of writers of comedy: not so much, however, for his humorous and natural portraits, as for those of eccentricity. His wit, indeed, flashes upon us almost to annoyance; and it is often difficult to distinguish the false humour of his fools from the genuine sallies of his lively characters. We shall con-Camden, in his Britannia, says, 'that he was clude these observations with Congreve's lite-

[•] The charming portraits shall be reviewed as productions of art in our next No.; and we have only to asy, that to their beauty and the literary merits of this volume, Mr. Moyes has joined a third quality worthy of high pralae, by printing the book in a superior manner, even for his accurate and admired press.

rary character from the pen of Dr. Johnson : | which is the portion of most of our great poets; Congreve has merit of the highest kind; he is an original writer, who borrowed neither the model of his plot nor the manner of his dialogue. He formed a peculiar idea of comic excellence, which he supposed to consist of gay remarks and unexpected answers; but that which he endeavoured he seldom failed of performing. His scenes exhibit not much of imagery or passion; his personages are a kind of intellectual gladiators—every sentence is to ward or strike; but they are the work of a mind replete with images, and quick in combination."

In the account of the house of Wise, of Ford

House, we are told:
"Sir William. Of this gentleman the following quaint anecdote is related. 'Having one day lente Henry VIII. his signet to seale a letter, which having powdered eremites on the seale, Why how now, Wise, quoth the king, what! hast thou lice here? And, if it like your majestie, quoth Sir William, a louse is a rich coate; for, by giving the louse, I part names with the French king, in that he giveth the floure de lice. Whereat the king laughed heartily to heare how prettily so byting a taunt (namely proceeding from a king) was so daintily turned to so pleasant a conceite.'

The Dymoke pedigree, with the championship, is interesting as it is ancient, but too long for our purpose. Another anecdote is more curious. Baskerville, of Pontrilas, "left an illegitimate son, Walter Baskerville, of Pontrilas, who married Jane, daughter and co-heir of Richard Monington, Esq. of Westhide, and Joan his wife, daughter and co-heir of John Baskerville, Esq. of Wotton, by whom he had a son and successor, James Baskerville, of Pontrilas, of whom it is recorded, that by two wives he had thirty children, and nearly as many by concubines; and it is further related, that he shewed to King James fifty stout sons."

Here we conclude, as we find nothing to match this piece of family history in the rest of the volume; and have only to add, that engravings of their arms accompany each genealogy, and that there are eighty-one of the races of the oldest commoners in the empire (many from the Conquest) ably traced in this first Part, which affords the fairest promise of the whole being satisfactorily done.

The Masque of Anarchy; a Poem. By Percy Bysshe Shelley. Now first published; with a Preface by Leigh Hunt. London, 1832.

What a solemn, and yet what a tender thing is death! It goes over the past like a gentle mist, shadowing with a soft darkness its errors, and bringing out with a mournful light its beauty or its excellence. In no instance has this spirit, so honourable to humanity, been more strikingly evinced than in the case of Shelley; his faults and his follies are buried with him, while every generous mind delights in flinging the green leaf or the fresh flower on his grave. Public opinion has greatly changed, but it has been just in its changes. During the life-time of Shelley, the little that Public opinion has greatly was known of him was of the most offensive nature; no sophistry can palliate, no circumstances extenuate, his early conduct : but since his demise, how much has been brought forward of touching regret for the past, of high generosity, of unselfish friendships, and of his kind-heartedness:—so that now a more favourable opinion of him is but justice. As a whole, Shelley's poetry will never, we do firmly believe, attain that familiar and domestic popularity, his obscurity, his verbiage, his questionable opinions, will be caviare to the million; but parts are of perfect beauty; and a selection, such, for example, as we reviewed last week, though that might be both improved and enlarged, must be a favourite with every lover of poetry. The poem before us has many of his faults and many of his beauties. The principal objection is its tone of exaggeration. Take such verses as the ensuing, quoted at random:

"With a pace stately and fast Over English land he past, Trampling to a mire of blood The adoring multitude. And a mighty troop around With their trampling shook the ground, Waving each a bloody sword For the service of their lord."

And again:

"And at length when ye complain, With a murmur weak and vain, 'Tis to see the tyrant's crew Ride over your wives and you: Blood is on the grass like dew.

Let the fixed bayonet Gleam with sharp desire to wet Its bright point in English blood, Looking keen as one for food."

Now, it is ridiculous to call these stanzas true pictures of the actual state of England; when or where have we been "ankle-deep in blood?" It may be urged, that these are but poetical expressions; but we do say they are injurious, most injurious. Nothing injures any great political cause more than exaggeration; it may have its effect in the feverish excitement of the moment, but the reaction is The reasoning and the rational inevitable. perceive the falsehood of a part, and hence discredit is thrown on the whole. No one who has either knowledge or reflection, can deny how much our legal code needs amendment; no one can deny how imperatively the destitute condition of a large portion of our countrymen calls upon us for alleviation by every means in our power; but the picturesque horrors, accumulated by the poet, not being confirmed by our sober judgment, raise a general inclination to disbelief, which too often extends to really existing grievances. We doubt much whether a writer like Shelley does not rather retard than advance any cause, however excellent, which he may advocate: for example, he associated with liberty and moral regeneration ideas of irreligion, lax morals, and visionary change; companions little likely to expedite the progress of better things. We now turn to the beauties of this slight volume: how fine is the description in these lines!

As clouds grown on the blast, Like tower-crown'd giants striding fast, Which glare with lightnings as they fly, And speak in thunder to the sky."

How noble, too, is the delineation of freedom!

"Science, and Poetry, and Thought, Are thy lamps: they make the lot Of the dwellers in a cot So serene, they curse it not. Spirit, Patience, Gentleness, All that can adorn and bless, Art thou: let deeds, not words, express Thine exceeding loveliness. Let a great assembly be
Of the fearless, of the free,
On some spot of English ground,
Where the plains stretch wide around. Let the blue sky overhead, The green earth, on which ye tread, All that must eternal be, Witness the solemnity. From the corners uttermost

From every hut, village, and town,
Where those who live and suffer, moan
For others' misery and their own.

From the haunts of daily life, Where is waged the daily strife With common wants and common cares, Which sow the human heart with tares:

Lastly, from the palaces, Where the murmur of distress Echoes, like the distant sound Of a wind alive around.

Let a vast assembly be, And with great solemnity Declare with measured words, that ye Are, as God has made ye, free!

Let the laws of your own land, Good or ill, between ye stand, Hand to hand, and foot to foot, Arbiters of the dispute. The old laws of England—they Whose reverend heads with age are gray, Children of a wiser day; And whose solemn voice must be Thine own echo—Liberty!"

We have omitted one or two violent opinions and images, which do but mar the effect of this noble picture. We have been, in this notice, led to touch on more political ground than is often with us either matter of inclination or obligation; but it was impossible without such allusion to speak of these pages. No one can be blind to the great changes now working around us; and we confess to being of those who believe that all great changes are the offspring of necessity: had they not been needed, they would never have arrived. But __ and all history bears us out in the assertion__ the troubles attendant on such epochs would have been as nothing, but for the impetuosity, the fanciful expectations, the violent animosities, the mental fever, into which men have permitted themselves to be wrought. Enthusiasm is unsafe company for new roads. Liberty is usually personified as a female; and Solomon says, "As a jewel in the nose of a swine, is a fair woman without discretion." A cool judgment to take, keep, and retain, is all that a people need for their rights: what passion never could achieve, reason will both attain and preserve.

We before alluded to Mr. Hunt's preface; it is written in the most warm and affectionate manner. There is something very touching in such a friendship; cordial and consistent through life, strong and enduring after death, it is one of those high and lasting feelings which both endear and elevate humanity.

There are many gross errors in the printing; but as ours is an early copy, in loose proof-sheets, we trust they will be corrected before the work is issued to the public, otherwise not a few passages will be wholly unintelligible.

The Missionary Annual for 1833. Edited by William Ellis. London, Seeley and Sons; Holdsworth and Ball; Simpkin and Marshall; Suttaby and Co.

ADDRESSED to one particular class of readers. this work seems to us well adapted to its purpose. The articles are various, and contain much information. Our old friend, Bernard Barton, has contributed a long and interesting poem; while Mr. J. Montgomery has enriched its pages with one or two shorter, but marked with his own peculiar and thoughtful sweetness. We had occasion, not long since, to mention, with the high praise which it deserved, Mr. Carne's "Lives of the Missionaries," a most delightful work; and his account here of "Kangersluksoak in Labrador," a missionary settlement, well merits that we should repeat our eulogium. The burning alive of Hindoo widows has long been the theme of pity and reprehension; but the bu-rying alive has more of novelty; we shall, therefore, extract the narrative.

"The late Captain Ebenezer Chapman Kemp,

I sailed to India, related to me a painful in-stance of this self-immolation which occurred in his own family. A young woman in his service lost her husband, and resolved, without hesitation, to bury herself alive with the body. Both Captain and Mrs. K. were shocked to hear of her determination, and represented to her both the dreadful character of the crime she was about to commit, and the utter inutility of the sacrifice to the departed spirit of her husband. But all the arguments and entreaties which Christian principle and the feelings of humanity could suggest were urged in vain. She had been taught to believe that, by voluntarily dying with her husband, she would expedite his transit to some unknown region of bliss, and herself bear him company. Every attempt to persuade the infatuated creature to live, whether for the sake of her family, or her own soul, appeared only to cause her the more to exult in her resolution to die. Captain K. continued his humane exertions to the last, even while the awful ceremony was proceeding, but without the least symptom of a favourable impression being produced on her mind. When the pit was dug, and the dead body lowered into it, she walked round several times, repeating the formularies which the priests dictated to her, and scattering about, as she went along, sweetmeats, parched rice, flowers, and other trifles, for which the spectators scrambled. When these preliminary rites were finished, she descended into the grave, amid the din of barbarous music and deafening shouts of applause. Having taken her seat, and placed the head of the corpse in her lap, she gave the signal to throw in the earth. I forget whether she had a son old enough to take part in the horrid scene, in which case he would be the principal actor; but otherwise, her nearest male relatives, as chief mourners, would take the lead, and throw in the first baskets of earth. For some time the grave filled slowly, as the deed of death was perpetrated with appalling deliberation, and the relations continued to throw in garlands, sandal-wood, and other trifles, with the mould that was gradually covering the bodies. When it rose to her breast, the woman raised her left arm, and was seen to turn round her fore-finger as long as it was visible, even after her head was covered. That, however, was a very short time, as the earth was thrown in hastily as soon as the head disappeared, and her relations jumped in to tread it down; and smother their wretched victim. At the very time that Captain Kemp was giving me the affecting account just detailed, several gentlemen in the service of the East India Company were united together for the purpose of collecting authentic information on the subject, with a view to bring it fairly and fully to the notice of the Supreme Government, and, if possible, obtain its abolition. In the following year, 1817, they succeeded in reference to the practice of burying alive, the government issuing orders and instructions for its abolition throughout the company's dominions. These orders were carried into immediate effect, without creating any alarm or dissatisfaction in the native mind."

To this we subjoin an account of an escape from a ship on fire:

" Many of the party, having retired to their hammocks soon after the commencement of the storm, were only partially clothed, when they made their escape; but the seamen on the or set foot on solid ground, absorbed every watch, in consequence of the heavy rain, pily succeeded in bringing away two compass from the binnacle, and a few candles from the cuddy-table, one of them lighted; one bottle of wine, and another of porter, were handed to us, with the table-cloth and a knife, which proved very useful; but the fire raged so fiercely in the body of the vessel, that neither bread nor water could be obtained. The rain still poured in torrents; the lightning, followed by loud bursting of thunder, continued to stream from one side of the heavens to the other, - one moment dazzling us by its glare, and the next moment leaving us in darkness, relieved only by the red flames of the conflagration from which we were endeavouring to escape. Our first object was to proceed to a distance from the vessel, lest she should explode and overwhelm us; but, to our inex-pressible distress, we discovered that the yawl had no rudder, and that for the two boats we had only three oars. All exertions to obtain more from the ship proved unsuccessful. The gig had a rudder; from this they threw out a rope to take us in tow; and by means of a few paddles, made by tearing up the lining of the boat, we assisted in moving ourselves slowly through the water. Providentially, the sea was comparatively smooth, or our overloaded boats would have swamped, and we should only have escaped the flames to perish in the deep. The wind was light, but variable, and acting on the sails, which, being drenched with the rain, did not soon take fire, drove the burning mass, in terrific grandeur, over the surface of the ocean, the darkness of which was only illuminated by the quick glancing of the lightning on the glare of the conflagration. Our situation was for some time exceedingly perilous. The vessel neared us more than once, and apparently threatened to involve us in one common destruction. The cargo, consisting of dry provisions, spirits, cotton goods, and other articles equally combustible, burned with great violence, while the fury of the destroying element, the amazing height of the flames, the continued storm, amidst the thick darkness of the night, rendered the scene appalling and terrible. About ten o'clock, the masts, after swaying from side to side, fell with a dreadful crash into the sea, and the hull of the vessel continued to burn amidst the shattered fragments of the wreck, till the sides were consumed to the water's edge. spectacle was truly magnificent, could it even have been contemplated by us without a recollection of our own circumstances. The torments endured by the dogs, sheep, and other animals on board, at any other time would have excited our deepest commiseration; but at present, the object before us, our stately ship, that had for the last four months been our social home, the scene of our enjoyments, our labours, and our rest, now a prey to the destroying element; the suddenness with which we had been hurried from circumstances of comfort and comparative security, to those of destitution and peril, and with which the most exhilarating hopes had been exchanged for disappointment as unexpected as it was afflictive; the sudden death of the two seamen, our own narrow escape, and lonely situation on the face of the deep, and the great probability even yet, although we had succeeded in removing to a greater distance from the vessel, that we ourselves should never again see the light of day, feeling. For some time the silence was scarcely

We hapimmortal beings on the brink of eternity. The number of persons in the two boats was fortyeight; and all, with the exception of the two ladies, who bore this severe visitation with uncommon fortitude, worked by turns at the cars and paddles. After some time, to our great relief, the rain ceased; the labour of baling water from the boats was then considerably diminished. We were frequently hailed during the night by our companions in the small boat, and returned the call, while the brave and generous-hearted seamen occasionally enlivened the solitude of the deep by a simultaneous 'Hurra!' to cheer each other's labours, and to animate their spirits. The Tanjore rose in the water as its contents were gradually consumed. We saw it burning the whole night, and at day-break could distinguish a column of smoke, which, however, soon ceased, and every aign of our favourite vessel disappeared. When the sun rose, our anxiety and uncertainty as to our situation were greatly relieved by discovering land a-head; the sight of it filled us with grateful joy, and nerved us with fresh vigour for the exertion required in managing the boats. With the advance of the day we discerned more clearly the nature of the country. It was wild and covered with jungle, without any appearance of population: could we have got ashore, therefore, many of us might have perished before assistance could have been procured; but the breakers, dashing upon the rocks, convinced us that landing was impracticable. In the course of the morning we discovered a native vessel, or dhoney, lying at anchor, at some distance: the wind at that time beginning to favour us, every means was devised to render it available. In the yawl we extended the table-cloth as a sail, and in the other boat a blanket served the same purpose. This additional help was the more seasonable as the rays of the sun had become almost intolerable to our partially covered bodies. Some of the seamen attempted to quench their thirst by salt water; but the passengers encouraged each other to abstain. About noon we reached the dhoney. The natives on board were astonished and alarmed at our appearance, and expressed some unwillingness to receive us; but our circumstances would admit of no denial; and we scarcely waited till our Singalese fellow-passenger could interpret to them our situation and our wants, before we ascended the sides of their vessel, assuring them that every expense and loss sustained on our account should be amply repaid."

"The Story of the World," by Josiah Conder, is a most intelligent paper; and, as a whole, the Annual does much credit to its well-known editor, Mr. Ellis.

The volume is embellished with a number of very beautiful woodcuts, amongst which we would especially distinguish the "Destruction of the Tanjore.

> Life of Sir David Baird. [Third Notice.]

In continuing our review of this work, we shall not detain our readers by farther comments from the perusal of those extracts by which we propose to elucidate our criticism. A large proportion, nearly half the work, after the point at which we had arrived in our last, is occupied with an account of the remarkable expedition from India to Egypt in 1801, to cooperate with the British army, then engaged in so strange a field of battle against the French having cased themselves in double or treble broken, and the thoughts of many, I doubt in that distant country. The conduct of this expedition by Sir David Baird, from Bombay to Kosseir, and thence across the desert to the Nile, and indeed the whole of his operations, are replete with interest; but we cannot separate any distinct transaction from the rest for transcript, and will only illustrate this portion by quoting a letter from Sir Arthur Wellesley, who was prevented by illness from accompanying the Anglo-Indian force. It is, says the editor, "a private letter from Colonel Wellesley to the general, which does so much honour to the manly straight-forward feeling of one party, and the high character of the other, that we are quite sure it will be read with pleasure and admiration.

" Bombay, April 9th, 1801. " My dear General, The first circumstance I have to detail to you is the state of my health, which is indeed the cause of this letter. have had no fever since I saw you, but I am sorry to say that the breaking out of which I complained is worse than it was, and has become so bad as to induce Mr. Scott to order me to begin a course of nitrous baths. This remedy, exclusive of the disease itself, is sufficient to induce me to be desirous to wait at least rather longer than the Susannah will, if not to give over all thoughts of joining you. I do this, I assure you, with reluctance, notwithstanding that I think it very probable that I shall soon hear of your being recalled; however, considering that circumstance, and the bad state of my body, and the remedy which I am obliged to use, I should be mad if I were to think of going at this moment. As I am writing upon this subject, I will freely acknowledge that my regret at being prevented from accompanying you has been greatly increased by the kind, candid, and handsome manner in which you have behaved towards me; and I will confess as freely, not only that I did not expect such treatment, but that my wishes before you arrived regarding going upon the expedition were directly the reverse of what they are at this moment. I need not enter farther into this subject than to entreat that you will not attribute my stay to any other motive than that to which I have above assigned it; and to inform you, that as I know what has been said and expected by the world in general, I propose, as well for my own credit as for yours, to make known to my friends and to yours, not only the distinguished manner in which you have behaved towards me, but the causes which have prevented my demonstrating my gratitude, by giving you every assistance in the arduous service which you have to conduct. I shall stay here as long as the season will permit, and then I propose to go round to Madras, and if I cannot get well, I believe I must try a cold climate. The Maria Louisa is unable to go on at present, and the 80th will sail by Saturday in the Morad Bey, 150; the Nelson, 70; the Dundas, 70; and about seventy followers distributed in the three ships. They will have six months' provisions of every thing, even of meat. The Asia would have been taken up for this detachment, according to your desire, only that she is dismasted, and wants copper on her bottom, and the owners were desirous that she should go into dock, if only for three days, before she should take her de parture for the Red Sea. This operation, however, and the equipment of her with masts, &c. was likely to take more time than will be lost by the slow sailing of the vessels above mentioned, and I therefore preferred them, and they will be ready immediately. I enclose the memorandum upon your operations, and I refer you to my public letter for other matters.

Wishing you every success, believe me, my dear general, ever yours most sincerely,
'ARTHUR WELLESLEY.'"

The memorandum alluded to is a very able military view of the probable course to be taken; but General Baird was prepared for every contingency before he received it, and acted most skilfully upon his own information and judgment. One of the most difficult positions of the contest was that in which the British were placed in order to protect the Beys and Mamalukes, who had been their efficient allies, and to whom they had pledged protection from the treachery of the Turkish Vizier and Capitan Pasha—the account of which is very honourable to Baird, and deeply interesting in itself. But, after all the diplomatic and threatening contest in this respect, the circumstances under which our countryman finally departed from Egypt shews that he must have acquitted himself as admirably in the eyes of his opponents, as generously in behalf of his endangered friends. He paid a farewell visit to the pasha, thus described :-

"On the 15th, the General, attended by his staff and other officers, with an escort of the 8th light dragoons, crossed the river from Gizeh to Cairo in the morning, where a Turkish guard of honour of horse and foot were drawn up to receive him. On landing, the general was met by the pasha's chief secretary and interpreter. After the usual compliments and honours being paid, the guards moved off in front at a slow pace towards his highness's palace, the kettle-drums and other music of the Turkish cavalry playing during the procession, while the heralds proclaimed the approach of the English general. On coming near the palace—formerly General Kleber's residence, and in which he was assassinated - we found the streets lined with Albanian guards up to the steps of the great staircase. The appearance of the soldiers was more sanguinary than martial; every man, besides his musket and bayonet, being armed with a brace of pistols, a sabre, and a dagger. Having arrived at the palace, the general dismounted, when he was received by the officers of state, and conducted to the chamber of audience. Here the pasha met the general at the door, and received him in the most flattering and distinguished manner. After being served with coffee, sherbet. &c., and the compliments customary on such occasions had passed, as well as a conversation of some length, relative to the march of the army across the desert, in the forwarding of which his highness offered in the most unreserved manner every assistance in his power. the general rose to take his leave, when the pasha requested his acceptance of a war-horse fully caparisoned, and a sword; adding that they were the gifts of esteem and friendship. The staff and other officers of the general's suite each received a sword. The general was requested by the pasha, as a particular honour, to mount the horse when he left the palace which he accordingly did, and was saluted with nineteen guns on crossing the great square. We then returned home in the same manner we came, amidst an immense concourse of people; and, as is usual in most Mussulmaun countries, were importuned for buckshess (money) on all aides. The saddle presented to General Baird was of solid silver gilt, the furniture of crimson velvet, with stars and crescents of the like metal. The horse was one of the most beautiful animals I ever beheld, and of the finest breed in Turkey. The general's sword was no less costly; the scab-bard and mounting being made entirely of gold, and the blade one of the true Damascans. We afterwards learnt that the whole of them that the whole of them had been sent by the grand signior to the pasha, upon raising him to his present high station in the empire. Two days afterwards the pasha returned the general's visit. His highness came to the Gizeh side of the river in his state barge, attended by a great number of others, full of grandees, janissaries, and attendants. The morning being remarkably fine height-ened the interest of the scene. The effect of the Turkish music on the water, and the gay appearance of the various flags and pendants, were truly striking; add to this, the reflections arising from a proper pride on beholding a British—and a British Asiatic army, from farther Ind,' drawn out upon the banks of old father Nile, to do honour to the Ottoman crescent, and you will, I think, envy us, as well as regret in no common degree your absence on such an occasion. The pasha, on landing, was received by two of the general's staff, a salute of cannon was immediately fired; the troops formed in a street, presented arms, and the bands began to play. His highness seemed highly pleased, bowed to the officers as he passed with much urbanity, and frequently remarked to the pasha of the Albanians, and the other great officers of his suite, the fine and martial appearance of the soldiers. The sepoys attracted much of his attention. A few yards from head-quarters (formerly the country-house of Morad Bey), the general, accompanied by the principal officers of the army, met the pasha, and after welcoming him to the garrison, and the usual compliments having passed, the whole procession entered the grand saloon, which had previously been fitted up in the Turkish style, with divans, carpets, &c. Here the officers formed a circle, and coffee, sherbet, &c. were served in the Oriental manner, the band of the 86th playing all the time. The pasha seemed particularly delighted with the music; he remarked that the tambourine and triangle, very nearly Turkish, afforded him much pleasure, especially in the 'Battle of Prague,' in which Kotzwarrow has introduced one of their national airs as the quick step. The eyes of the janissaries kindled at hearing their favourite call to battle. After being entertained for a considerable time in this manner, and much civility having been exchanged, the pasha rose to take leave. The general then requested his highness and his principal officers to accept of some arms of English workmanship, consisting of fusees, pistols, &c. He also presented the pasha with some jewels set in the eastern mode. On his highness leaving the gateway, the general having ordered two of the finest Mocha bulls to be brought there, begged his highness's acceptance of them. This last present the pasha seemed highly pleased with, as the breed is unknown in Turkey. The humps on their shoulders occasioned many observations from the attendants. The general having accompanied the pasha a few yards towards the river, his highness requested he would go no farther. He expressed himself highly gratified with his reception, and repeated his professions of friendship, and anxious wish to assist the army in their march across the desert. He then embarked under the accustomed honours and salute. Having thus de-tailed to you this ceremony, I shall not intrude longer on your patience, and only add, that from the cordial and friendly disposition of the pasha, I think we shall accomplish this march across the desert to Suez without much loss or difficulty, and unattended by those fatigues and hardships so severely felt, yet so nobly surmounted in the former ordeal, from the quoted a portion. Both frontispiece and vigshores of the Red Sea across the arid, burning desert of the Thebaid."

To this quotation we limit ourselves for the present (intending a short conclusion in our next); and shall only add here, that Sir David returned to India, was employed in Arcot, but left the country in disgust upon some disagreement in the service; that hastening home in a South-Sea whaler, he was captured by a French privateer, but luckily retaken by an English frigate; that being regularly exchanged for the French general Morgan, he commanded the expedition, 1805, in conjunction with Sir Home Popham, by which the Cape of Good Hope and all its dependencies were conquered; and that having supported the expedition against South America, so unfortunately frustrated at Buenos Ayrcs, he was recalled by the Whig ministry of 1806-7.

Twenty Parochial Sermons. By the Rev. C. Girdlestone, &c. &c. pp. 346. Second Series. London, 1832, Rivington; Parker, Oxford; Langbridge, Birmingham.

OF the first series of Mr. Girdlestone's plain, practical, and excellent sermons, we spoke in those terms of approbation which they merited from every friend of morality and piety. The present volume is equally praiseworthy, and admirably adapted for family reading.

On Circulating Credit; with Hints for Improving the Banking System of Britain, and Preliminary Observations on some of the Modern Doctrines of Political Economy. By a Scottish Banker. 8vo. pp. 210. Edin-burgh, 1832, Tait; London, Simpkin and Marshall; Dublin, Cumming.

This is a work of great good sense and utility. The author, besides a thorough knowledge of banking, displays an acute and philosophical mind in drawing distinctions (not sufficiently attended to) and defining terms, the confusion of which has much perplexed most writers on this very difficult subject. We do not say that we agree with all the opinions here maintained; and in some cases we would certainly advise other remedies. But still the work is an important one, and has many clear views of its subject. The chief suggestions enforced are—
1. to open London banking to companies, instead of (no one could give a good reason why) restricting the firms to six persons; 2. assimilating the English to the Scots system: 3. allowing licensed bankers to issue bills upon government securities, so as to prevent the ill effects of sudden pressure and panics. Our author, like all men not warped by theories, asserts the expediency and the necessity of a well-regulated and well-secured paper currency.

Standard Novels, No. XXI. Lawrie Todd; or, the Settlers in the Woods. By John Galt, Sq. F.A.S., &c. &c. Revised, corrected, and illustrated with a new Introduction, Notes, &c. by the Author. London, 1832. Bentley.

ORIGINAL, ORIGINAL, intelligent, and characteristic, Lawrie Todd was one of the very best works of its popular author. It now appears as a light and portable volume, with some quaint notes, stating Mr. Galt's opinions on his production; and we doubt not that its second popularity will equal its first. These said direction of Mr. Sidney Hall. The references notes are very curious, as pointing out the to "every city, town, village, and hamlet, in sources of invention and the originals of the three kingdoms," are distinct and sufficiently are should indeed be Christmas Tales, Historical and Domestic. By W. H. Harrison. Pp. 280. London, 1832. Jennings and Chaplin.

A VERY prettily ornamented and substantial binding, stories, and pictures - such are the attractions which this little volume holds out to its youthful readers. The engravings were all originally designed to illustrate the works of Sir Walter Scott, of whom there is a medallion in the title-page; and we give Mr. Har-rison no little credit for the ingenious manner in which he has adapted to the prints new and interesting fictions. We would particularinteresting actions. We would particularise "the Novice," as introducing a very distinguished personage in English history, the brave and romantic Earl of Peterborough. We should justify our favourable opinion by quotation; but it spoils a short story to quote a portion, and they are, as a whole, too long for our columns.

The Aldine Poets, No. XXIII.; Dryden, Vol. III. London, 1832. Pickering. MR. PICKERING proceeds steadily and excel-lently with his design. This is an interesting volume of Dryden; containing many of his shorter miscellaneous poems, his prologues and epilogues, and his translations from the Greek and Roman classics. It is delightful to look back on these productions, from the midst of much modern poetry; and even where we excel, the comparison is a very pleasing exercise.

Otterbourne. By the Author of "Derwent-water." 3 vols. 12mo. London, 1832. Bentley.

THIS novel promises to be a manifest improvement on its predecessor; but though we may augur well, we cannot definitively pronounce of a whole work from an animated commencement: and we have not had time for a more extended perusal.

copious and useful publication at length, and have much gratification in saying that, now it is completed, it does ample justice to the eulogy we bestowed upon the first volume, in No. 735 of the Literary Gazette. The editors of the work seem to have spared no pains and diligence in executing their task; and the publishers have acted with equal judgment and liberality in having the maps done under the direction of Mr. Sidney Hall. The references junction with the text, or we should have surprised if so much of enterprise, expenditure, yacht.

and merit, were to fail in being rewarded by a large share of public patronage. For our domestic statistics, no library can contain a work of greater utility.

ORIGINAL CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor, &c.

SIR - In the island of Antigua, where I principally reside, a library society has been established, which takes in your valuable Journal of literature. Having been resident some years in the West India Islands, I have been much impressed with the beauty of their scenery and natural productions. Surpassing the Cyclades in picturesque attractions, they want but their classic associations to be objects of equal admiration. St. Pierre has eloquently and justly remarked - " Nothing is wanting to the other hemisphere of the globe but a Theocritus or a Virgil, in order to our having pictures at least as interesting as those of our own country. It is, however, but too manifest that the beautiful scenery and tropical splendours of the Antilles are seldom sufficiently estimated. Their skies are cloudless, their seas of the deepest purple, and their towering pinnacles crowned with...

" Insuperable height of loftiest shade, Cedar and branching palm."

In short, they present a wide field for pleasing contemplation to those who love to " muse on nature with a poet's eye." Animated by these influences, I have been occasionally led to give expression to my thoughts in verse; and if the following short night-sketch be worthy of a place in your Gazette of elegant letters, it is much at your service. Should you honour it by insertion, I shall, from time to time, do myself the pleasure of communicating with you in a similar vein, and remain, sir, your very obedient servant, THE AUTHOR.

A WEST INDIAN BOAT-SONG.

"While in speed His galley mates the flying steet, He chides her sloth."—Lord of the Isles.

Evening had drawn her veil over the West India isles, and began to breathe refreshment through the languid archipelago, when a gay colonist steered the course of his small pleasure-boat to a sister island. It was one of those romantic excursions in which a fair charmer is the loadstar of attraction, and for which the enchanting nights within the tropics seem so peculiarly adapted. The moon had not yet risen, but the planet Venus, in the western horizon, shed a long line of lustre on the water, giving nearly as much light as the moon in her quarters in England. Many brilliant constellations unknown to European skies-and, conspicuous among them, the resplendent cross of the south, - shone down through the transparent atmosphere. The skiff, built of the cedar of the Somers Isles, glided before the steady trade-breeze with the effortless motion of a bird, when it shoots athwart the sky without vibrating its outstretched pinions. Not a sound was heard but the waves' ripple at her bows; and the sea sparkled along her course with that luminous phosphoric beauty which has so often been described by voyagers in warm latitudes, but has seldom been adequately depicted. Darkly majestic, the island of destination slept, far off on ocean, rearing its dim peaks to the skies. With tiller in hand, and eyes turned steadfastly towards the distant haven, the islander, in tones rendered mellower by the water, thus invoked his trim Bermuda-built

My fairy bark, bound, bound along! Venus shines sweetly on the sea; Gift of the land of Ariel's song.* Oh might he lend his speed to the! For beauteous eyes are strained to hail Thy graceful prow and swelling sail. Not he who first this western main Traversed, to wed a virgin world, Sighed fonder the rich goal to gain Than I to see thy white wings furled: Oh, could thy cold unconscious keel The passioned heart's impatience feel! Away, away! yon shaddock-grove
Still with its perfume loads the gale;
That tells me from the grape-tree cove
Thou yet hast made but scanty sail:
Like Love's own breath, o'er occan's face
It comes to chide thy lingering pace. The winged fish, to speed his flight, Spreads his wet pinion to the wind, Shoots past thee like a beam of light, And leaves thee, laggard, far behind: Oh, for those silver wings, to bear Thee, falcon-like, through yielding air! Ye fire-tipt waves that flash around
My flame-lit vessel as she glides,
And, while ye make melodious sound,
Spangle with light her gleaming sides,
You're like the magic halo shed
Round spots where earthly angels tread. My bark, thou'rt on the "ladies' sea"—†
Course gallantly the gentle tide!
This night, as in the race, still be
The fair one's hope, the victor's pride!
Fly! and thy pennon, for thy haste,
Shall be a band from beauty's waist. A virgin-pilot held the helm
Of the charmed skiff of Tuscan song,
And gaily o'er the watery realm
The damsel shaped its course along:
But speed thee o'er the foaming brine,
A lovelier mistress shall be thine. Venus has set, the south cross bends—
The star of love withdraws its smile,
The type of faith down heaven descends;
Then give, oh give the shade-robed isle!
The very stars look cold and dark
On laggard lord and loitering bark.

LAMBDA.

THE vacation having terminated, the members resumed their meetings on Wednesday evening, and we felt gratified that they assembled so numerously. It appears but the other day that the distribution of rewards took place. The extensive encouragement this institution has afforded, and continues to afford, to all grades of society, is the more to be wondered at, when the rapid progress which the "march of intellect" has made within the last few years is considered. It is admitted that knowledge may act both ways; and that though our surprise is excited when we contemplate the variety of objects which have received the fostering aid of this institution, general improvement is so widely gaining ground, that we doubt not but time will ever produce novelty for the consi-deration of this society. Many communications were reported to have been received, particularly in the branch of mechanics, which were referred to that committee. Among several very valuable works, the secretary announced that the "Public Records" had been presented by the commissioners.

Mr. Faraday is immediately to commence the evening illustrations, on the plan of last year. The subject of the first, the "Theory of Flame."

LINNÆAN SOCIETY.

Ox Tuesday evening the first of the evening meetings for the present session was held: A. B. Lambert, Esq. in the chair. A communication addressed to Mr. Brown, by M. Batka, a druggist of Prague, in Bohemia, containing some Observations on the plants which yield the cinnamon and cassia barks, was read to the

M. Batka is induced to view the cassia as only another variety of cinnamon, and that the Chinese cassia bark is the produce of an undescribed species. Cassia buds he considers as perhaps the fruit of the Laurus Manillensis of Cavanilles: the Gumanimi, or East India copal, which has been ranked by some as the produce of the Vateria Indica, and by others as a species of Elæocarpus, he has determined to be the produce of the Hymenaa verrucosa. His Grace the Duke of Northumberland, Earl Powis, and several gentlemen, were proposed as fellows of the Society. During the recess the rich her-barium of the East India Company has been presented by that honourable body to the Society: this herbarium consists of 100,000 specimens of plants, comprising about 9,000 species, many of them new and hitherto unknown to Europe. The specimens were collected in the East Indies during the last thirty years, chiefly by König, Roxburgh, Röttler, Klein, Hamilton, Heyne, and Dr. Wallich. Accompanying this splendid donation, which renders the herbarium of the Linnman Society by far the richest in the world, was a quantity of the finest paper, what is usually called the water-mark bearing the impress of the Company's arms: the paper (value 3001.) is intended for the preservation of the plants; on each leaf a dried specimen is placed. With so much care and judgment have they hitherto been preserved, that the natural colours and tints of many of them are bright and fresh, and will continue so for a number of years; affording an ample fund for the study of the botanist and artist.

LITERARY AND LEARNED.

SIR WALTER SCOTT.

A MEETING was held yesterday at Bridge-water House, the residence of Lord F. L. Gower, and politely assigned for the occasion, to consider what would be the most fitting Gower, and politely assigned for the occasion, to consider what would be the most fitting mark of respect to Sir Walter Scott's memory, and admiration of his genius. His lordship was called to the chair by Mr. Croker, and briefly stated the object of the meeting. Mahon, after some appropriate observations, moved a series of resolutions, which were seconded by Sir Francis Burdett, who paid a high compliment to the moral worth and integrity of Sir Walter Scott. Some discussion ensued, of which we have only time to say, that the result was the appointment of a general and a sub-committee to carry the resolutions into effect.

"To secure the house and estate of Abbotsford," as they now exist, as an heir-loom to his posterity, is the purpose in view; and a general subscription the means.

One of the chief anxieties expressed by all the speakers was, to have it clearly understood that the lowest donations, as a testimony of the universal feeling of admiration to the de-parted minstrel, would be as acceptable as the highest; and that a system would be adopted to enable the donor of a shilling to give his mite as readily as the donor of many pounds, and have a record of the fact preserved for ever at Abbotsford. About fifty noblemen and gentlemen distinguished in the literary circles attended.

PINE ARTS.

WINTER EXHIBITION

Of deceased and living British Artists, Suffolk Street, Pall Mall.

[Second Notice.]*

WE observed in our preliminary notice of this exhibition, that the works of the deceased and of the living artists of the British school were, "to a certain extent," brought into juxtaposition. Of course it was not to be expected that the full powers of either the one or the other could be summoned to the comparison at the first experiment. Enough, however, has been done to excite interest, and to gratify curiosity; and the public, as well as the Society to which the gallery belongs, are much indebted to Lord Northwick, Sir William Curtis, Major Beauclerc, Robert Vernon, Esq., and the other patrons of the British school, for the kindness and promptitude of the contributions from their various and valuable collections. Of the works of the deceased artists we do not mean to say any thing further. Most of them have been before the public, and have been celebrated in their day. If there are garlands to be bestowed, let them decorate the brows of the living, rather than be left to fade on the tombs of the dead. Among those which appear to us to deserve such honour, we proceed to particularise:

No. 81. The Falconer. Henry Wyatt. -Whether considered with reference to appropriateness of character, harmony of colour, or vigour of execution, this admirable picture may fearlessly compete with any of the productions, not only of our own artists of former days, but of those who are more generally known by the designation of "the old masters."

No. 14. Study from Nature. James Holland. The works of this artist more than promise to do credit to our native talent. His versa-tility is exemplified in No. 292, Gateway; which he has invested with qualities well fitted to rouse the imagination, and fill it with solemn and mysterious ideas.

No. 20. Calais Sands; Shrimpers going out; Morning; No. 245. Autumnal Evening. J. Wilson. — The one displays the effect of splendid and glittering light; the other the gloom of declining day: each is admirable in its way.

No. 145. The Body of Harold, discovered by Swanashal and two Monks, after the Battle of Hastings. A. J. Woolmer. - In this performance Mr. Woolmer has shewn a powerful imagination, as well as great skill in historical composition. The effect of light is grand and

No. 64. The Adjourned Debate. T. Clater. We, for the credit of our legislators, hope there is no necessary connexion between politics and cobblering, but artists seem to think there is; as witness, the lamented Liverseege's " Political Cobbler," and other works of a similar nature. In the present instance, the character and the point of time are well chosen. The chagrin of Strap, and the impatience of the potboy, are happily depicted, and in the artist's best and most careful style. No. 36. The Linguist, also by Mr. Clater, is of a higher class, and exhibits his knowledge of chiaro-scuro to great advantage.

No. 108. Comus, a Sketch. T. Uwins. —We see little to which the term "sketch" is applicable; but much that deserves to be admired as a work of art.

No. 44. Carnarvon Castle; Morning. E. Child. - It must be a strong prejudice that will not allow this performance to rank with many of the works of Vanderneer, of which it is an excellent imitation.

No. 4. The Angler. J. W. Allen. - One of the most brilliant of several similar specimens of light and aërial perspective.

No. 75. Wood Scene; No. 222. Decoy for Wild Ducks. J. Starke.—Whether in wood or river scenery, the pictures of Mr. Starke continue to hold their rank among any masters, old or new.

No. 136. A Blind Girl. J. Boaden. - We imagine a portrait; but whether as portrait or as subject, it is interesting from its character, colouring, and tone; and harmonises well with the older pictures by which it is surrounded.

No. 289. Sacramental Plate; No. 294. Fruit, &c. G. Lance. — In all that belongs to the splendid, these admirable examples have never been excelled; no, not by the artist himself.

No. 48. Privileged Pets. Miss E. F. Dagley. The first tale given to the public by Miss Dagley, in which nature and character were fairly illustrated, was "The Cat and her Kit-ten;" nor are they lost sight of in her graphic representation.

No. 181. "Master's out:" the disappointed Dinner-party. R. W. Buss. — This is a truly cockney misery; comic to all but the unfortu-nate wights, who have toiled up Highgate Hill to get a prospect, an appetite, and "though last, not least," a dinner at the house of their country friend! The whole is depicted with much humour, and with a variety of chagrin that must be seen to be duly appreciated.

No. 221. Interior. D. Roberts. - Like the rest of this artist's admirable works, replete with fine colouring, effect, and execution. We understand that Mr. Roberts has set off for Spain, where he will no doubt further enrich his style by the study of Spanish and Moorish architecture.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

Carlisle, from near Cummersdale. On stone, by G. Barnard, from a Drawing by M. Nutter. Carlisle, Thurnam; London, Moon, Boys, and Graves.

A PLEASING specimen of local lithography.

Lady Peel. Sir T. Lawrence. Engraved by T. Cousins. London, Moon, Boys, and Graves.

This beautiful specimen of art has been published several weeks, and is already so familiar to London eyes, that we need only point out its attractions to our distant readers. It is a peculiarly graceful production, and possesses all the softness and elegance of the artist, without the slightest tinge of the meretricious. The expression of the head is of a touching interest, in which sweetness, or we might, perhaps, say tenderness, prevails. The costume is also executed with a delicate hand; and the whole portrait replete with merit.

Engravings from the Works of the late H. Liverseege. Part II. London, Moon, Boys, and Graves; Manchester, J. C. Grundy. THE second part of this admirable work will extend even the great popularity of the first part. Of its class, we know of no publication of the fine arts superior to it. A portrait (one of the few painted by Liverseege), the closet-scene, and the grave-diggers, from Hamlet, are the three pieces; and the latter alone, by Bromley, is a gem worthy of the choicest habitat in the amateur's portfolio. The looks and attitudes of the characters remove them far from the common-place of the stage; and we think we can hear the argument between them as to Christian burial. The ghost in the closet-scene is also well done by Giller: the portrait (of an artist's sister, we understand) is curious and characteristic.

New Readings of Old Authors: Shakspeare-Romeo and Juliet, No. I. Lond., Wilson. To those who can bear to see the beauties of our great bard turned into the ridiculous, these whimsical caricatures of passages in Romeo and Juliet will furnish amusement and a laugh. They are ten in number, and several of them exceedingly droll. For instance:-A race in sacks illustrates the line, "Wisely and slow, they stumble that run fast." "The mangled Tybalt" is a corpse drawn flat out of a mangle. "Put this in any liquid thing you will," is a cook with a pair of tongs handing a kitten to his wife to be drowned. But sight must be the critic in this instance, for we cannot describe the various new graphic readings.

National Portrait Gallery of Illustrious and Eminent Personages; particularly of the Nineteenth Century. With Memoirs by William Jerdan, Esq. Part XLIII. Fisher. Son, and Co.

THE memoirs in the Forty-third Part of the National Portrait Gallery are those of her Royal Highness Victoria Maria Louisa, Duchess of Kent; the Right Rev. James Henry Monk, D.D., Lord Bishop of Gloucester; and the Right Hon. Robert Stewart, K.G., Marquess of Londonderry. The first, although it comprehends every material fact, is necessarily brief: "It is a compliment," observes the biographer, "that it is so; for a few words suffice to record the events of a life passed in the constant and quiet performance of duties, as an affectionate wife and most devoted mother." The memoir interest by those who are of opinion with the writer of it; that, " to trace the progress of eminent men to the dignities they fill in the several departments of church or state, is the surest way of trying the worth and working of those institutions which are established among us for the common good: every instance of merit rewarded, and honours judiciously bestowed, swells the sum of the motives which bind the patriot to his native land; for, in every such example, he beholds a new stimulus to exertion in the service of his country." following is the character given of the late Marquess of Londonderry:

"He was bold and uncompromising in character, yet bland and conciliating in manner: possessed of high talents, and devoted to business with an intenseness of application never surpassed. Magnanimous and noble-minded, he shone with a bright lustre in the most difficult of all situations, that of leader of the House of Commons, where he met the attacks of his opponents either with a calm indifference or a proud defiance, as the occasion demanded; but always with a temper which won the admiration and respect of even his bitterest adversaries. His speeches were very unequal; the general style being marked by an infelicitous use of words, and a want of perspicuous arrangement; insomuch that it was sometimes alleged, that he was employing language to conceal and throw a veil of mystery over the measures he was called upon to explain. But at other times, when matters of great national consequence required the exercise of his abilities, he rose with the circumstances, and delivered the most statesman-like, practical, and intelligent orations; laying down fundamental principles with philosophical precision, enlightening questions of complicated embarrassment, and convincing all who heard him of the vast acquisition of knowledge he had stored up through his long-continued association with affairs of equal nicety and magnitude. influence in debate was confessed accordingly; and while his polished deportment disarmed hostility, his firmness and decision overawed offensive attack. And the contest over, however warm it might have been, his spirit seemed instantly to relapse into a repose natural to it; and his memory to retain no angry recollection of the past. The amiable character of his private life soon superseded the ruffling of the political storm; and gentleness and good humour were manifested towards the rivals who had arraigned his administration, and impugned his conduct in the severest terms."

The portrait of the Duchess of Kent is very spirited and pleasing: it is from a picture by H. Collen, which we think we recollect to have seen in the exhibition. The portrait of the Bishop is after Moore; and that of Lord Londonderry from Lawrence's graceful and wellknown painting of that accomplished nobleman.

Illustrations of the Novels and Tales of the Author of Waverley, Part I.: a series of Portraits of eminent historical Characters introduced in those Works, accompanied with Biographical Notices. London, 1832, Evans; Glasgow, Griffin and Co.; Edinb. Stillies.

This is a cheap illustration of these celebrated novels; and of a new character. There are four portraits in the first part, viz. the Young Chevalier, Col. Gardiner, Rob Roy, and the Duke of Montrose; from known pictures of these individuals, some of them, if not all, already engraved. The style is not very good, of the Bishop of Gloucester is more elaborate, and ought to be improved, even though the and will, we should think, be read with great price is low. The notices are succinctly written, and sufficient for the purpose. The project is to be completed in eight parts.

Picturesque Illustrations of Westmoreland, Cumberland, Durham, and Northumberland; from Original Drawings by Thomas Allom. Part II. Fisher, Son, and Co.

"CORBY Castle," situated on the rocky but richly wooded banks of the Eden; "Upper Reach, Ullswater," a piece of water scenery that can scarcely be surpassed in grandeur; the magnificent and extensive ruins of "Warkworth Castle;" "Scotswood Suspension Bridge, which adorns the river Tyne a few miles above Newcastle; a bird's-eye view of "Bowness and Windermere Lake;" "Kendal," with the beautiful river Kent winding its course through rich and fertile meadows; "Brancepeth Castle," an edifice deemed equal in magnificence and grandeur to any of the baronial residences in the north of England; and the romantic neighbourhood of "Castle Eden Hall," are the illustrations of the present portion of Messrs. Fisher's most interesting work. They are all highly creditable to the talents and taste of Mr. Allom, and Messrs. Floyd, Lacey, W. Le Petit, and Jeavons.

ROYAL ACADEMY.—Mr. Stanfield and Mr. Geddes were on Monday elected associates of the Royal Academy.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

November 6th, 1832.

Sia,—Having been requested on all sides to give a second part to "Dryburgh Abbey," I have continued the characters, commencing with the "Monastery" and concluding with the last of Scott's novels, "Count Robert of Paris" and "Castle Dangerous." After finishing it, I thought you might possibly have had enough of the subject, especially since a continuation had already appeared in the Literary Gasette: you see, however, that I decided upon sending it you, considering it my best course to leave it to your own judgment. My chief objections to the "continuation" published in the Lite. Gaz. is, that the characters are irregularly mixed, backward and forward, from one novel to another, ad ibitum. I have been at some trouble—from "Waverley" to "Castle Dangerous"—to give the "characters" described in each work in the same order they originally appeared, never beginning a new romance without finishing the last one; so that, considered merely as a "poetical catalogue" of the principal characters in the Waverley Novels, I hoped it might have interest. Should you conclude upon giving it insertion in the Lit. Gaz. I shall be most happy to see it there; and remain, &c. C. SWAIM.

DRYBURGH ABBEY.

[Part Second.]

"But, ah! that mournful dream proved truethe immortal Scott was dead !"

The great magician of romance and knightly lay had fled-

The "Ariosto of the North"-the voice of Tweed no more

Might pour its music o'er our hearts, and charm us as of yore!

The spirit of departed days recall'd my dreaming mood;

Once more, methought, within the vale of gloom and death I stood:

Still, far from east to west that train of mourners swept along,

And still the voice, or vision, of my waking dream was song!

- Oavid Hume visited this part of the country, about 1750; and the following lines, written by him upon a pane of glass at the Old Bush Inn., at Carlisle, were communi-cated to Mr. Howard, to whom Corby Castle belongs, by the late lamented Sir Walter Scott:—
 - "Here chicks, in eggs for breakfast, sprawl, Here godless boys God's glories squall, While Scotsmen's heads adorn the wall; But Corby's walks atone for all."
- † It affords us much pleasure to conclude this poem from the pen of its originator. The design is pathetic, and the composition not less so.—Ed. L. G.

- I saw the courtly "Euphuist," with "Halbert of the Dell,"
- And, like a ray of moonlight, pass'd the "White Maid of Avenel;
- "Lord Morton," "Douglas," "Bolton," and the "Royal Earl," march'd there,
- To the slow and solemn funeral chant of the "Monks of Kennaquhair."
- And she on whose imperial brow a god had set his seal,
- The glory of whose loveliness grief might not all conceal;
- The loved in high and princely halls, in lone and lowly cots, Stood "Mary," the illustrious, yet hapless
- Queen of Scots!
- The firm, devoted "Catherine;" the "sentimental Græme;"
 "Lochleven," whose worn brow revealed an
- early blighted name;
- The enthusiastic "Magdalen," the pilgrim of that shrine,
- Whose spirit triumphs o'er the tomb, and makes its dust divine.
- Next " Norna," of the Fitful-head, the wild Reim-kennar, came,
- But shiver'd lay her magic wand, and dim her eye of flame;
- Young "Minna Troil," the lofty soul'd, whom
 "Cleveland's" love betray d;
 The generous old "Udaller;" and Mordaunt's
- sweet island maid.
- Slow followed "Lord Glenvarloch," first of Scotia's gallant names;
- the fair, romantic " Margaret," and the erudite " King James;
- The woo'd and wrong'd "Hermione," whose
- lord all hearts despise;
 Sarcastic "Malagrowther;" and the faithful " Moniplies :"
- Then stout "Sir Geoffrey" of the Peak and
- "Peveril" swept near;
 Stern "Bridgenorth," and the fiery "Duke," with knight and cavalier;
- The fairest of fantastic elves, "Fenella," glided
- And "Alice," from whose beauteous lip the light of joy was gone:
- With "Leicester, Lord of Kenilworth," in mournful robes, was seen
- The gifted, great "Elizabeth," high England's matchless queen!
- "Tressilian's" wild and manly glance, and "Varney's" darker gaze, Sought "Amy Robsart's" brilliant form, too
- fair for earthly praise;
- And "Quentin's" haughty helm flash'd there; "Le Balafré's" stout lance;
 "Orleans;" "Crevecœur;" and brave "Du-
- nois," the noblest knight of France;
 The wild "Hayruddin," followed by the silent "Jean de Troyes,"
- The mournful "Lady Hameline," and "Isabelle de Croyes."
- Pale sorrow mark'd young " Tyrrell's" mien; grief dimm'd sweet " Clara's" eye;
- And "Ronan's Laird" breath'd many a prayer for days and friends gone by!
- Oh, mourn not! pious "Cargill" cried; should his death wo impart,
- Whose cenotaph's the universe, whose elegy's the heart !
- Forth bore the noble "Fairford" his fasci-
- nating bride,
 The lovely "Lilias" with the brave "Red Gauntlet" by her side;

- "Black Campbell," and the bold redoubted
 "Maxwell," met my view;
 And "Wandering Willy's" solemn wreath of
 - dark, funereal yew!
- As foes who meet upon some wild, some far and foreign shore,
- Wreck'd by the same tempestuous surge, recall past feuds no more;
- Thus prince and peasant, peer and slave—thus friend and foe combine
- To pour the homage of their heart upon one common shrine!
- There "Lacy," famed "Cadwallon," and the fierce "Gwenwyn," march'd on;
- Whilst horn and halberd, pike and bow, dart, glaive, and javelin shone;
- "Sir Damian," and the elegant young " Eve-
- line," pass'd there; Stout "Wilkin," and the hopeless "Rose," with wild, dishevell'd hair.
- Around, in solemn grandeur, swept the banners of the brave,
- And deep and far the clarions waked the wild
- dirge of the grave; On came the "Champion of the Cross," and
- near him, like a star, The regal "Berengaria," beauteous daughter of Navarre:
- The high, heroic "Saladin," with proud and
- princely mien, The rich and gorgeous Saracen, and the fiery
- Nazarene;
 There "Edith" and her "Nubian slave" breath'd many a thought divine,
- Whilst rank on rank a glorious train rode the knights of Palestine!
- Straight follow'd "Zerubbabel," and "Joliffe"
- of the tower,
 Young "Wildrake," "Markham," "Hazel-
- dine,"and the forest nymph "Mayflower;"
 The democratic "Cromwell," stern, resolute, and free;
- The "Knight of Woodstock," and the light and lovely "Alice Lee:"
- And there the crafty " Proudfute," for once
- true sorrow felt;
 "Craigdallie," "Chartres," and the recreant
 "Conachar the Celt;"
- And he, whose chivalry had graced a more ex-
- alted birth,
 The noble-minded "Henry," and the famed fair "Maid of Perth;"
- The intrepid "Anne of Geierstein," the false "Lorraine," stepp'd near;
- Proud "Margaret of Anjou," and the faithful brave "De Vere;"
 There "Arnold," and the "King René," and
- "Charles the Bold," had met
- The dauntless "Donner Lugel," and the grace-ful young "Lizette:"
- Forth rode the glorious "Godfrey," by the gallant " Hugh the Great,
- While wept the brave and beautiful their noble
- minstrel's fate; Then "Hereward," the Varangian, with "Bertha" at his side,
- The valorous "Count of Paris," and his Amazonian bride:
- And last, amidst that princely train, waved high " De Walton's" plume,
- Near fair "Augusta's" laurel-wreath, which Time shall ne'er consume :
- And "Anthony," with quiver void, his last fleet arrow sped,
- Leant, mourning o'er his broken bow, and mused upon the dead!

MUSIC.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

The Musical Gem: a Souvenir for 1833 Mori and Lavenu.

This is the first of the musical Annuals we have seen. It contains some sweet airs: "The May Blossom," "Weep not for thy Roses," and "Merrily, merrily, hark the Bells;" the first and last by Auber, and the second by the Devil and the Temptation, - and is embellished with several lithographic likenesses of last season's prime donne. These make it a very pleasant drawing-room companion. Some of the airs are quite familiar to us, having been published before.

Three Italian Cavatinas, arranged for the voice, flute, and piano forte, by C. M. Sola. Cocks and Co.

NOTHING can be more beautiful than these cavatinas of Donizetti, Blangini, and Pacini, delightfully arranged, and admirably suited to amateur performers from their simplicity. We cannot praise them too highly; and most cordially recommend them to our musical friends.

The Polish Melodies. by T. Augustine Wade, Esq. Cochrane an after-piece, succeeded. and Co.

THE Polish Melodies are not calculated to increase Mr. Wade's reputation; they possess neither spirit nor melody.

Christian Vespers. Written and composed by C. Hutcheson, Esq. Glasgow, R. and J. Finlay.

A WELL-WRITTEN introductory sketch on the rise and progress of sacred vocal music precedes sixteen excellent hymns, the harmony of which displays considerable skill in composition.

Let me waltz along. Nothing can equal the Drum's merry sound. Donnadieu. Boosey and Co.

Two well-known airs of Donnadieu's, with translation of the original.

Four Sacred Melodies. The Words by Charles V. Incledon; the Music by R. L. Wallis. Purday.

WE cannot say much in praise of these melodies: they do not rise above mediocrity.

Farl Percy: a Border Legend. When this Life is o'er. The Words and Music by Henry Fase. H. Fase.

Two pleasant compositions. Earl Percy is a peculiar and delightful ballad. We have been much pleased with it, and feel assured it will become popular.

He laughs, and he rides away. An amusing trifle, founded on the Hammersmith hoax about the Duke of Cumberland's frightening some perfections in that quarter.

Je l'aime trop. Romance, by C. M. Sola. Sans le vouloir. The same. Paris, Pacini. EVERYBODY likes this kind of little French composer.

DRAMA.

DRURY LANE.

On Monday, the début of Mr. Kean, engaged for a limited number of nights, attracted a full Horn,-two nice sets of quadrilles from Robert the exception of a feebleness in his walk, which is not so injurious to the aged Jew as to parts of greater activity, he retains all the fierce and tiger-like passion of his younger day, and chastened with more of experience and judgment. The rest of the cast was strengthened by Braham in Lorenzo, with introduced songs; and Miss Betts, also, as Jessica, with additional music. The play was received with much applause. On Tuesday, the School for Scandal was repeated with as strong a cast as the company afforded, and including Macready, Farren, Braham, Dowton, Harley, Cooper, Mrs. Nesbitt, Mrs. Glover, &c. On Wednes-day, William Tell was admirably personated by Macready; and Miss Kenneth acted Albert for the first time very delightfully. The The Poetry and Music Doom Kiss, doomed, as we anticipated, to be

On Thursday the Merry Wives of Windsor, with Dowton as Falstaff, drew but an indif-ferent house. The play was indeed only tolerably acted in general.

COVENT GARDEN.

MONDAY was fruitful in novelties, old or new; for, besides Kean at Drury, we had the Queen's Theatre opened under other "allspices;" a piece at the Adelphi; and the Dark Diamond, an original drama, here. The music is by Mr. Adolphe Adam; the scenery by the Messrs. Grieve; and the dresses by Mr. Head and Mrs. Balding: the first uniformly pleasing, and occaof Condottieri, who enlists on the side of palm of the handsomest limbs and . . . F Francis I. of France (Mr. G. Bennett) against be it from us to venture an opinion. M the Emperor Charles V.; and is a most brave E. Tree acted charmingly from first to last. her uncle, Cardinal Jeronimo (Evans) to oppose plans the flight of his mistress, and carries her off from a night-scene, in which the king finds his way to her chamber, and excites the jealousy of the fiery Veronese. Pursuit is vain, and the (not) happy pair get to a wild Alpine castle, where the Dark Diamond resolves on revenge against Francis; and is so wrought upon by a false letter dropped in his way, that when he hastens to join the emperor, he is convinced of his wife's guilt, and leaves her a prisoner in the charge of one of his officers. The letter- A NEW drama, called Henriette, has been played

Eighteen years have therefore elapsed possible for us to say much in favour of this since we witnessed the earliest impression he attempt. The language is often poor and often made in this character; and we can bear our inflated. A man would rather see the whole testimony to its being still one of the best world drowned by a second Noah's flood, than within the range of his performances. With tears drop from the eyes of his lady, - which is bombast; and the same person, when refused these very eyes by the king, accuses him of blinking the question — which is pitiful. The heroics throughout are rather in the Ercles' vein; and Mr. Butler delivered his share of them accordingly - certainly not exalting his reputation as a candidate for the highest walk in buskins. The composition, too, was inartificial and disjointed; and the turns so abrupt as to be almost laughable. One important event hinges upon the Diamond's overhearing his wife uttering a loud soliloquy; and his relapse towards Francis, after taking him prisoner at Pavis, is so confoundedly sudden, that it completely justifies the ludicrous good bye bidden him by the imperial general — "I've business." The finale is bad, resting on the ruffian Zingano's gasping repentance and dung-hill confession of his villany; but, truly, little better could be expected from an assassin who, having his hated enemy in his power, could not put an end to him at once, but must do it quite dramatically, by stealing his horn that he might not blow it for his adherents, and playing a number of other very silly and un-murderous tricks. The dresses, we have noticed, were splendid; and the chamberlain must have particularly liked his suit, since he went to the battle of Pavia in silk hose and pumps, his lower extremities being at difference with the cuirass and shining helm which adorned his body and head. When the ladies Vittoria, Laurina, and Zanetta, escape from the castle, they are dissionally of higher merit; the second excellent guised as minstrels, and prettily equipped. All throughout; and the last superb. The Dark the Paris's among the audience seemed to have Diamond (Mr. Butler) is a nom de guerre of had the apple of discord thrown among them; English words: they are little more than a Stefano Diamente, a Veronese noble, and leader for we never heard such disputes as to the Far and successful opponent of the Germans in the spirit of the beginning being only equalled Italy. He is in love with and secretly betrothed by the pathos of the ending. Miss Shirreff and to Viltoria Colonna (Miss E. Tree), protected Miss H. Cawse also both performed and sang at the court of Fontainbleau; and in return sweetly; their duet was by far the best bit of for his services demands the king's assent to music in the piece-very original as of Spanish their union. But the gallant Francis himself birth, and deservedly encored. A violin solo, at entertains a passion for the lady, and procures the opening of the third act, struck us as peculiarly beautiful; and it was delightfully exethe marriage. This is resented by Stefano, who cuted. Upon the whole, however, the Dark Diamond did not shine with sufficient attraction ever to be a gem of the first water. It was too long by a long hour; and the magnificent scenery and clever dancing (witness Adele, Vedy, and Mr. Theodore Guerinot) were not sufficient to compensate for its other defects. Perhaps when compressed unsparingly, it may be more effective.

ADELPHI.

chanson, and everybody will, we are sure, be plot, however, is the performance of Zingano here with great clat throughout the week; and if admirable acting should draw full and applanding audiences, it well merits the success which has attended it. The story is neither in the 3d, at Coates, Fifeshire) of Sir John Leslie, morale nor conduct so good as Victorine; but in some points of pathetic performance it is of a still higher standard. Henriette, the daughter of the game-keeper of the Marquess de Monval, is seduced under promise of marriage; which promise the marquess is, by the force of circumstances, and lest he should cause the death of his mother, led to forfeit, and marry his cousin, a countess. The gamekeeper had been saved by his father when condemned to be shot for some military offence, and is devotedly attached to the son of his benefactor, and the wronger of his child. This attachment is horridly put to the test, by his being charged with the murder of a gentleman whom the marquess has killed in a rencontre, when sporting in his woods. Philip, though aware of the real opened at Glasgow for the erection of a monufact, refuses to justify himself and involve his ment to the memory of Sir Walter Scott in master. He is condemned and executed in spite of every effort to save him. The third act has the remaining parties, with some other characters, after a lapse of two years, in Italy, where the marquess is pursuing a course of where the marquess is pursuing a wars of mention the almost utter failure of vegetation unlucky wife. Yates in the marquess was also excellent; and O. Smith in the father, Buckstone a lowly gardener, Reeve a danso-maniac, Miss Daly the marchioness, Hemmings the lover, equally

Cape de Verd Islands .- Among the uncommon phenomena of nature which have been observed during the few last years, we have to rain, and the drought has dried up every thing of the earth's produce, from the lowly blade of grass to the leaf of the lofty tree. It is four years since the rains were copious enough; and the aggravated evil is now witnessed in the Literature in Germany.—The last number of the general catalogue of books, published every six months at Leipsic, contains 2,322 new publications; and as the foregoing number of the catalogue has but 320 works fewer, the sum of the books published last year in Germany amounts to 4004! which number surpasses that of the yearly publications of England and France taken collectively.

Synopsis of Stenography. - Stenography, if we may judge from the frequent receipt of productions in that way, must be very sedulously deserving of praise for their exertions. The cultivated by a number of professors. LITERARY NOVELTIES.

Memorials of the Professional Life and Times of Sir William Penn, are announced by Granville Penn, Esq. Our readers may remember that he was a Knight, Admiral, and General of the Fleet during the Interregnum; and Admiral, and Commissioner of the Admirally and Navy, after the Restoration. The period embraced is very interesting, viz. from 1644 to 1670.

Also, edited by the same Author, the Character of a Trimmer: his Opinions of, 1. The Laws and Government; 2. Protestant Religion; 3. The Papists; 4. Foreign Affairs. By the Honourable Sir William Coventry, Knight. First printed in 1687.

Mr. Prout has proposed to publish by subscription a royal folio vulume, containing Fifty Architectural and Picturesque Subjects. In Flanders and Germany, drawn on stone by himself, and Fac-aimiles of his Sketches made on the spot. We consequently look for a delightful work of art, full of truth and spirit.

"Nothing can exceed the truth and keeping of his sketches, or rather cabinet pictures, from real life. He is ac close observer, and in a right spirit. He neither writes a salire nor a eulogy, but shews us men and women as they are. Too often selfish and frivolous no doubt, yet often preserving in the heart, as in a citade, principles of honour and strong feeling, which ever and anon break forth to humanise and virify the waste about them. The good and evil of life are balanced with a steady and impartial hand; and lessons of manners, virtue, windom, cherfulness, and toleration, are every where insimuated in action, or illustrated in the shape of animated and natural dialogue."—Bdisburgh Review.

REVIEW OF NEW BOOKS.

The Lives and Exploits of Banditti and Robbers in all Parts of the World. By C. Mac Farlane, Esq., Author of "Constantinople in 1829," and the "Romance of Italian History." 2 vols. London, 1833. Bull; An-

MR. MAC FARLANE most truly observes, that "there are few subjects that interest us more generally than the adventures of robbers and banditti. In our infancy they awaken and rivet our attention as much as the best fairy tales; and when our happy credulity in all things is wofully abated, and our faith in the supernatural fled, we still retain our taste for the adventurous deeds and wild lives of brigands. Neither the fulness of years nor the maturity of experience and worldly wisdom can render us insensible to tales of terror such as fascinated our childhood, nor preserve us from a 'creeping of the flesh' as we read or listen to the narrative containing the daring exploits of some robber-chief, his wonderful address, his narrow escapes, and his prolonged crimes, seated by our own peaceful hearth."

This taste will be amply gratified by a perusal of these volumes, which are full of perilous adventure, hair-breadth escapes, and shocking murders; and we have only to entreat that our readers will not peruse the remainder of this column till after dark, that they may have the full benefit of the horrors we are about to lay before them.

The Bandit's Test.-" A young man, who had been several years an outlaw, on the vio-lent death of the chief of the troop he belonged to, aspired to be Capo-bandito in his stead. He had gone through his noviciate with honour, he had shewn both cunning and courage in his calling as brigand, but the supremacy of the band was disputed with him by others, and the state of the times bade the robbers be specially careful as to whom they elected for their leader. He must be the strongest-nerved fellow of the set! The ambitious candidate offered to give any, even the most dreadful proof of his strength of nerve; and a monster among his companions proposed he should go to his native village and murder a young girl to whom he had been for-merly attached. 'I will do it,' said the ruffian, who at once departed on his infernal mission. When he reached the village, he dared not present himself, having begun his crimes there by murdering a comrade: he skulked behind an old stone fountain, outside of the village, until near sunset, when the women came forth with their copper vases on their heads to get their supplies of water at the fountain. His mistress came carelessly gossipping with the rest. He could have shot her with his rifle, but he was afraid of pursuit, and wanted, besides, time to secure and carry off a bloody trophy. He therefore remained quiet, only hoping that she might loiter behind the done? He was determined to go through the ried him thus far homeward in safety. He had ordeal and consummate the hellish crime. A no misgiving as to the character of the people child went by the fountain whistling. He laid down his rifle, so as not to alarm the little villager, and presenting himself to him, gave him the reliquary he had worn round his neck for years, and which was well known to his mistress, and told him to run with it to her, and tell her an old friend desired to speak with her at the fountain. The child took the reliquary, and a piece of silver which the robber gave him on his vowing by the Madonna to say nothing about the matter in the village before one hour of the night, and ran on to the village. The robber then retired behind the old fountain, taking his rifle in his hand, and keeping a sharp look out, lest his mistress should betray him, or not come alone. But the affectionate girl, who might have loved him still, in spite of his guilt, who might have hoped to render him succour on some urgent need, or, perhaps, to hear that he was penitent and anxious to return to society, went alone and met him at the fountain, where, as the bells of the village church were tolling the Ave Maria, her lover met her, and stabbed her to the heart! The monster then cut off her head, and ran away with it to join the brigands, who were obliged to own, that after such a deed and such a proof as he produced, he was worthy to be their chief."

Hungarian Horse-dealer .- " On the third night after his departure from Vienna, he stopped at a quiet inn, situated in the suburbs of a small town. He had never been there before, but the house was comfortable, and the appearance of the people about it respectable. Having first attended to his tired horse, he sat down to supper with his host and family. During the meal, he was asked whence he came, and when he had said from Vienna, all present were anxious to know the news. dealer told them all he knew. The host then inquired what business had carried him to Vienna. He told them he had been there to sell some of the best horses that were ever taken to that market. When he heard this, the host cast a glance at one of the men of the family who seemed to be his son, which the dealer scarcely observed then, but which he had reason to recall afterwards. When supper was finished, the fatigued traveller requested to be shewn to his bed. The host himself took up a light, and conducted him across a little yard at the back of the house to a detached building, which contained two rooms, tolerably decent for an Hungarian hostel. In the inner of these rooms was a bed, and here the host left him to himself. As the dealer threw off his jacket and loosened the girdle round his waist where his money was deposited, he thought he might as well see whether it was all safe. Accordingly, he drew out an old leathern purse that contained his gold, and then a tattered parchment pocket-book that enveloped the Austrian rest. She, however, was one of the first to bank notes, and finding that both were quite balance her vessel of water on her head, and to right, he laid them under the bolster, extintake the path to the village, whither all the gos guished the light, and threw himself on the the neighbourhood with his screams?' As it

sips soon followed her. What was now to be | bed, thanking God and the saints that had carno misgiving as to the character of the people he had fallen amongst to hinder his repose, and the poor dealer was very soon enjoying a profound and happy sleep. He might have been in this state of beatitude an hour or two, when he was disturbed by a noise like that of an opening window, and by a sudden rush of cool night air; on raising himself on the bed, he saw peering through an open window which was almost immediately above the bed, the head and shoulders of a man, who was evidently attempting to make his ingress into the room that way. As the terrified dealer looked, the intruding figure was withdrawn, and he heard a rumbling noise, and then the voices of several men, as he thought, close under the window. The most dreadful apprehensions, the more horrible as they were so sudden, now agitated the traveller, who, scarcely knowing what he did, but utterly despairing of preserving his life, threw himself under the bed. He had scarcely done so, when the hard breathing of a man was heard at the open window, and the next moment a robust fellow dropped into the room, and after staggering across it, groped his way by the walls to the hed. Fear had almost deprived the horse-dealer of his senses, but yet he perceived that the intruder, whoever he might be, was drunk. There was, however, slight comfort in this, for he might only have swallowed wine to make him the more desperate, and the traveller was convinced he had heard the voices of other men without, who might climb into the room to assist their brother villain in case any resistance should be made. His astonishment, however, was great and reviving when he heard the fellow throw off his jacket on the floor, and then toss himself upon the bed under which he lay. Terror, however, had taken too firm a hold of the traveller to be shaken off at once,-his ideas were too confused to permit his imagining any other motive for such a midnight intrusion on an unarmed man with property about him, save that of robbery and assassination, and he lay quiet where he was until he heard the fellow above him snoring with all the sonorousness of a drunkard. Then, indeed, he would have left his hiding-place, and gone to rouse the people in the inn to get another resting-place instead of the bed of which he had been dispossessed in so singular a manner; but, just as he came to this resolu-tion, he heard the door of the outer room open then stealthy steps cross it then the door of the very room he was in was softly opened, and two men, one of whom was the host and the other his son, appeared on its threshold. Leave the light where it is,' whispered the host, 'or it may disturb him and give us trou-ble.' 'There is no fear of that,' said the younger man, also in a whisper, 'we are two to one; he has nothing but a little knife about him—he is dead asleep too! hear how he snores!' 'Do my bidding,' said the old man sternly; 'would you have him wake and rouse could scarcely suppress a shriek, but he saw that the son left the light in the outer room, and then, pulling the door partially after them saw the two murderers glide to the bed-side, all the party which had collected in the stable and then heard a rustling motion as of arms on hearing what passed there. Both father descending on the bed-clothes, and a hissing, and then a grating sound, that turned his soul sick, for he knew it came from knives or daggers penetrating to the heart or vitals of a human being like himself, and only a few in-ches above his own body. This was followed by one sudden and violent start on the bed, accompanied by a moan. Then the bed, which was a low one, was bent by an increase of weight caused by one or both the murderers throwing themselves upon it, until it pressed on the body of the traveller. There was an awful silence for a moment or two, and then the host said, ' he is finished - I have cut him across the throat - take the money, I saw him put it under his bolster.' 'I have it, here it is,' said the son: 'a purse and a pocket-book.' The traveller was then relieved from the weight that had oppressed him almost to suffocation; and the assassins, who seemed to tremble as they went, ran out of the room, took up the light, and disappeared altogether from the apartment. No sooner were they fairly gone than the poor dealer crawled from under the bed, took one desperate leap, and escaped seen enter the unfortunate wretch, who had evidently been murdered in his stead. He ran with all his speed into the town, where he told his horrid story and miraculous escape to the night-watch. The night-watch conducted him to the burgomaster, who was soon aroused from his sleep, and acquainted him with all that had happened. In less than half an hour from the time of his escape from it, the horse-dealer was again at the murderous inn with the magistrate. and a strong force of the horror stricken inhabitants and the night-watch, who had all run thither in the greatest silence. In the house all seemed as still as death; but as the party went round to the stables they heard a noise; cautioning the rest to surround the inn and the outhouses, the magistrate, with the traveller and some half-dozen armed men, ran to the stable-door: this they opened, and found within the host and his son digging a grave. The first figure that met the eyes of the murderers was that of the traveller. The effect of this on their guilty souls was too much to be borne; they shricked, and threw themselves on the ground; and though they were immediately seized by hard griping hands of real flesh and blood, and heard the voices of the magistrate and their friends and neighbours, denouncing them as murderers, it was some minutes ere they could believe that the figure of the traveller that stood among them was other than a spirit. It was the hardier villain, the father, who, on hearing the stranger's voice continuing in conversation with the magistrate, first gained sufficient command over himself to raise his face from the earth; he saw the stranger still pale and haggard, but evidently unhurt. The mur-derer's head spun round confusedly; but, at length rising, he said to those who held him, Let me see that stranger nearer; let me touch him-only let me touch him!' The two murderers were forthwith bound and carried to the town gaol, where, on the examination, which was made the next morning, it appeared from evidence that the person murdered was the youngest son of the landlord of the inn, and a person never suspected of any crime more serious than habitual drunkenness; that instead of being in bed, as his father and brother had believed him, he had stolen out of the house, and joined a party of carousers in the town: of these boon companions, all appeared in evidence; and two of them deposed that the deceased, being exceedingly intoxicated, and dreading his father's wrath, should he rouse the house in such a state, and at that late hour, had said to them that he would get through the window into the little detached apartment, and sleep there, as to the window. The deceased had reached the window once, and as they thought would have got safe through it, but drunk and unsteady as he was, he slipped back; they had then some difficulty in inducing him to climb again, for in the caprice of intoxication, he said he would rather go sleep with one of his comrades. However, he had at last effected his entrance; and they, his two comrades, had gone to their respective homes. The wretched criminals were executed a few weeks after the commission of the crime. They had confessed every thing, and restored to the horse-dealer the gold and the paper-money they had concealed, and which had led them to do a deed so much more atrocious than even they had contemplated."

The Spanish Brigand is a story communicated by Mr. Brockedon, and will be a relief to the last.

"A short time after the French war, and the restoration of Ferdinand VII., whose contraveller let the host approach him, and pass duct made many of the loose guerilla parties him in the Sierra. 'But were you really athis hand over his person, which, when he had continue out in the country as brigands, an tacked on your journey?' inquired the mer-

Much struck with his appearance, the Englishand son walked with considerable confidence man entered into conversation with him, and into the room; but when they saw by the was still more delighted by his frank, spirited lamps the night-watch and others held over it, style of address and talking. Before supper was ready, the two had established that sort of upon the bed, they cried out, ' How is this! traveller-intimacy which is not perhaps the less delightful because it must finish in a few side. She had been roused from sleep towards Madrid were urgent. 'But cannot by the noise made in the stable, and then by you stay where you are a day or two?' replied her husband's shriek, and was now herself the Spaniard; 'by that time they may have shifted their ground, and you may pass the mountains without meeting them.' The Englishman repeated that his business was urgent, said he was no coward, that he had hitherto travelled in Spain without any misadventure, and hoped still to do so. 'But, my good Señor,' replied the Spaniard, 'you will not cross the mountains to-morrow without being robbed, take my word for that! ' 'Well, if it must be so, let them rob me,' said the English merchant; 'I have little money to lose, and they will hardly take the life of an unarmed and unresisting man!' 'They have never been accustomed so to act-let it be said to the honour of the band, they are not such cowardly assassins,' replied the Spaniard, who was then silent, and seemed to be musing to himself. The Englishman was beginning to call up one of the servants of the posada, to shew him to he had often done before, and that they two his resting-place, when his companion, raising had accompanied him, and assisted him to climb his hand said, Not yet, Señor, not yet! listen!' and he continued in an under-tone, ' It was my fortune, some time since to have to cross the Sierra Morena alone, like you; it was occupied then, as now, by the Salteadores; but I met a man, also alone, as you have met me, who said he had rendered the captain of the band some service, and that he could give me a pass which should cause my person and my property to be respected by the robbers, and enable me to cross the mountains with perfect safety. 'A much better thing this than a king's pass-port,' said the astonished Englishman. 'Pray what was it? and did it succeed?' 'It was only a button,' replied the Spaniard; 'it did all that had been promised, and perhaps it has not yet lost its charm-I will give it you, here it is!' After searching in his pocket, the Spaniard produced a curiously filagreed silver button, and placed it in the hands of the Englishman, begging him to be careful of it, and to present it to any robbers that might attack

'The button was respected by all the jed, and soon after rose to take his leave. rebbers I met, and I believe I saw them all, said the Spaniard; 'but ask no more questions, and take care of the button! to-morrow you will see whether it has lost its charm.' many thanks, the Englishman took his leave, and went to bed. On the following morning, when he continued his journey, the silver but-ton ran in his head for some time. But it was not until noon, as he was tolling up one of the most rugged of the mountain paths, that he had the opportunity of trying its virtue. There his guide, who rode before him, was suddenly knocked off his mule by a blow from the buttend of a musket, and the next instant three other guns were levelled at the Englishman's breast, by men who stepped from behind a rock. The attack was so sudden, that his ideas and recollection were disturbed, and he put his hand in his pocket, brought out his purse, and delivered it to the robbers, who were calling him all sorts of opprobrious names, before he thought of his silver button. But when the recollection came to his mind, and he produced it, much doubting of its efficacy, the oaths of the Salteadores were stopped at once, as though a sacred relic had been held before their eyes; they returned him his purse, carnestly entreated his pardon for all that had happened, and informed him that it was their bounden duty to selection of stratagems, exploits, and piracies, see the bearer of that button safe across the mountains. Accordingly, on went the mer-chant with the brigands for his guard, he blessing the silver button, and they shewing him every possible attention and respect. On their way they met with other robbers, which proved how formidable was the band, and how impossible it would have been to escape them without the charmed button. At length they came to a low, solitary house in a wild dell, far away from the beaten path across the Sierra, which they had abandoned for rocks that seemed never to have been trodden. Here the merchant was told he might stop and refresh himself. Nothing loath, he dismounted, and turned to the door, when his companion at the posada tion, connected, as they are, with our religion, of the preceding evening—the donor of the our earliest associations, and our matured magical button, met him on the threshold, with thoughts, those of Egypt and Babylon are the words and gestures of an hospitable welcome. 'I got here before you,' said the captain of the banditti, for such in fact was the donor of the button, and have prepared a good dinner for you, being very certain, that what I gave you last night would bring you in safety under my roof.' The Englishman expressed his gratitude, and they sat down to dine. The bandit's dishes were savoury and good, and his wine was better. As the wine warmed the Englishman, he again expressed his gratitude, and lon, with their stupendous antiquities, form a sist of astronomical and genealogical records then ventured to say how astonished he was common centre of attraction to the biblical, the and monthly calendars. BABYLONIAN INSCRIPTIONS AND ALMANACS

The Morning Watch; or, Quarterly Journal on Prophecy, and Theological Review. No. XV. 8vo. London, 1832. Fraser.

NEXT to the antiquities of the Jewish nafraught with the deepest interest to every reflecting mind; and this interest is of so varied of Israel; or as members of that mysterious national triad whose temporal fortunes form forth those of the church and her spiritual adversaries throughout subsequent ages; or of mystery and wonders, and, until the present hour, the great storehouses whence the museums and collections of Europe draw their most interesting contents,-Egypt and Baby-

twenty-three centuries that have passed by since the father of history visited Egypt_ antiquity and progress of the arts and civilisation in that country - are no longer a secret; and the ingenious but fallacious theories advanced by the savans who sought the land of the Pharaohs at the commencement of the present century, have been replaced by truth.

The Babylonian remains still continued without any satisfactory explanation; and until within a short period of the time at which we write, were overshadowed by a cloud of obscurity, dense as that which veiled elucidation of their arrow-headed inscriptions. The first important step. has been at length tion similar to that opened by the primary readers, in consequence of its announcement in a journal which, although of great critical merit and ability, has, from the peculiar theological opinions — those of Mr. Irving — which it advocates, been, we believe, hitherto of more limited circulation than it is justly entitled to as a journal of learning and science. To announce the progress of discovery, and give publicity to merit, in whatever quarter it is to be found, has been the province of the Literary Gazette since its commencement. We spared neither expense nor exertion to make our readers accurately acquainted with the progress of the great hieroglyphic question, and propose giving similar attention to the progress of that now before us.

The remains on the banks of the Euphrates, from being composed of more perishable materials than those on the Nile, are neither so extensive nor so various. The interest inseparable from the country which was the second cradle of mankind, and the birth-place of the arts and sciences, is, however, not inferior to that which attaches to the nation in which the of men of all opinions and tastes. Whether to those for whom superior antiquity has viewed as the cradle and the prison of the house charms, it will not be less interesting to trace the progress of contemporary civilisation in the age of the pyramids, than in that of their the theme of the Old Testament, and shadow architectural successors, the hieroglyphic monuments

The lithographic inscriptions of Egypt, so as the birth-place of the arts, sciences, and far as we are yet enabled to interpret them, civilisation of mankind; or, lastly, as the land are for the most part either chronological or dedicatory. It follows, that for seeking astronomical records in these inscriptions, we are warranted and guided by the only ancient written data that are extant; just as the testimony of Manetho taught us to look for the chronicles of the Pharaohs on their sculptured monuments. With his mind thus guided, the first important fact detected by the editor is, that the inscriptions on the Babylonian bricks consist, for the most part, of monthly calendars or almanacs, each involving a series of either thirty or thirty-five numerical characters; the former having reference to the common months of thirty days each, and the latter to the twelfth or intercalary month, to which five days were added by the Egyptian, the Chaldean, and most Oriental nations, after the primitive solar year of three hundred and sixty days was discovered to be imperfect, as ancient writers are unanimous in testifying. The characters of which these numbers are composed are common to every calendar, with certain variations, and consist of a series of seven characters, answering to the planetary days of the week, which are found repeated in each calendar, until the required monthly number is completed; the most prominent variation in the calendars, independently of the difference between those for the common and intercalary months already adverted to, being deducible from the number of lines in which the thirty or thirty-five num-bers are found inscribed. These consist, first, of ten lines, each containing three characters or numbers; secondly, of six lines, each containing five characters, and of seven lines, each containing five, one line being intercalary; and, thirdly, of three lines, each consisting of ten characters; and of four lines, three of them containing ten characters each, with an intercalary line consisting of five.

six-line and seven-line calendars, and the threeline and four-line calendar, are respectively companions; the first, in either case, referring following account of Dr. Adam's youth is a true to the common month of thirty days, and the second to the intercalary month of thirty-five days; while, of the ten-lined calendars, no intercalary companions have been discovered, (three characters in depth, which does not admit of the line of five for the intercalation), none can exist. The immediate inference from this distinction is, that the ten-lined inscripantiquity of the single and double calendars; and, accordingly, the single ones are the rarest, and, from their appearance, the most ancient. We propose to resume it when expedient; and, in the interim, earnestly recommend the able dissertation which has occasioned the present notice to the learned world, and our reflecting friends generally.

ONE of those great and laborious works which may be emphatically called national—a vast storehouse, where the thoughts and actions of the past are garnered up for the instruction of the future. We know no man so competent to this onerous task as Mr. Chambers. As the Dumfries Courier well observes, " If ever Scotland could boast of an author whom she might call exclusively her own, it is Robert Chambers." The conversation having turned one day on the successes of Mr. Hume as an author, Anderson said, 'Mr. David, I daresay other people might write books too; but you clever fellows have taken up all the good subjects. When I look about me, I cannot find one unoccupied.' Hume, who liked a joke upon an unsuspecting clergyman, said, 'What would you think, Mr. Anderson, of a history of Crossus, king of Lydia?—that has never yet been written.' Mr. Anderson was delighted with the idea, and, in short, 'upon that hint he wrote.' In 1755 was published, 'The History of Crœsus, king of Lydia, in four parts; containing observations on the ancient notion of destiny, or dreams, on the origin and credit of the oracles, and the principles upon which their oracles were defended against any attack.' What is perhaps the best part of the jest, the work was honoured with a serio-burlesque notice in the Edinburgh Review, then just started by Hume, Smith, Carlyle, and other wits - the article being written, we have no doubt, by the very man who incited the unhappy author to his

"One of the last attempts of Dr. Anderson was a pamphlet against the principles of the French revolution. This being not only written in his usual heavy style, but adverse to the popular sentiments, met with so little sale, that it could scarcely be said to have been ever published. However, the doctor was not discouraged; adopting rather the maxim, 'contra audentior ito,' he wrote a ponderous addition or appendix to the work, which he brought with him to Edinburgh, in order to put it to the press. Calling first on his friend Principal Robertson, he related the whole design, which, as might be expected, elicited the mirthful sur-prise of the venerable historian. 'Really,' said Dr. Robertson, 'this is the maddest of all your schemes - what! a small pamphlet is found heavy, and you propose to lighten it by making it ten times heavier! Never was such madness heard of!' 'Why, why,' answered Dr. Anderson, 'did you never see a kite raised by boys?' 'I have,' answered the Principal. 'Then, you must have remarked that, when you try to oat-meal made into porridge, together with raise the kite by itself, there is no getting it small beer, of which he only allowed himself up; but only add a long string of papers to its half a bottle at a time. When he wished to tail, and up it goes like a laverock! The reverend Principal was completely overcome by this argument, which scarcely left him breath to reply, so heartily did he laugh at the ingenuity of the resolute author. However, we believe, he eventually dissuaded Dr. Anderson from his design."

Stratford Jubilee ._ " One of the most remarkable masks upon this occasion was James Boswell, Esq. in the dress of an armed Corsican chief. He entered the amphitheatre about twelve o'clock. He wore a short, dark-coloured coat of coarse cloth, scarlet waistcoat and breeches, and black spatterdashes; his cap or bonnet was of black cloth; on the front of it was embroidered, in gold letters, Viva la liberta; and on one side of it was a handsome blue feather and cockade; so that it had an elegant, as well as a warlike appearance. On the breast of his coat was sewed a Moor's head, the crest cients regarding the mode of recording astrono- tures, yet persist in writing and publishing mical data at Babylon, and the quantity of, books, which nobody ever reads, and still, like He had also a cartridge-pouch, into which was and method of intercalating the solar year in the man crazed by the lottery, expect that the was hung upon the belt of his cartridge-pouch. upon it, emblematical of the sweet Bard of | Avon. He wore no mask, saying, that it was not proper for a gallant Corsican. So soon as he came into the room, he drew universal attention. The novelty of the Corsican dress, its becoming appearance, and the character of that brave nation, concurred to distinguish the armed Corsican chief. He was first accosted by Mrs. Garrick, with whom he had a good deal of conversation. Mr. Boswell danced both a minuet and a country dance with a very pretty Irish lady, Mrs. Sheldon, wife of captain Sheldon of the 38th regiment of foot, who was dressed in a genteel domino, and before she danced, threw off her mask."

This was on the 13th of October; and we learn from a manuscript note upon the preacher's own Bible, that the chapter which he expounded on this occasion was the eighth of the book of Daniel. In this is detailed the vision of the ram with two horns, which is at first powerful, but at length overcome and trampled down by a hegoat; being an allegory of the destruction of the kings of Media and Persia by Alexander of the kings of Media and Persia by Alexander of Macedon. deavoured to extend the parable to existing circumstances, and of course made out Cromwell to be the he-goat. The preacher further chose for a text the following passage in the Psalms. 'But I as a deaf man heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth. Thus I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reproofs. For in thee, O Lord, do I hope: thou wilt hear, O Lord my God.' Ps. xxxviii. 13, 14, 15. This sermon was probably by no means faithful to its text, for certainly Mr. Zachary was not the man to keep a mouth clear of reproofs when he saw occasion for blame. The exposition, at least, was so full of bitter allusions to the sectarian general, that one of his officers is reported to have whispered into his ear for permission to 'pistol the scoundrel.' Cromwell had more humanity and good sense than to accede to such a request. 'No, no,' said he, 'we will manage him in another way.' He asked Mr. Zachary to dine with him, and gained his respect by the fervour of the devotions in which he spent the evening. The Monumental Effigies of Great Britain. By the late Charles Alfred Stothard, F.S.A. With Introduction and Descriptions by A. J.

Kempe, F.S.A. London, 1832. Arch. served, in the introduction to the work, that Britain; for, blending at once the artist with O that I could refraine from teares, and that because they are salt like yourselves! &c." the antiquary, he has aimed at shewing the progress of sculptural science in the memorials Anecdote of Cromwell.—" Cromwell, having extant for the illustrious dead; regarding them extant for the illustrious dead; regarding them not simply as monumental records, but also as the efficient means of bringing before our view the characters of English history in their habits Stothard succeed in this attempt; faithfully yet tastefully transferring to his portfolio subnexion may exist between costliness and elegance in matters of costume.

Effigies made their appearance on tombs about the middle of the twelfth century, and the idea of so placing them had probably been suggested to the sculptor by their having been previously for some time in use on seals. At an earlier period our Saxon and Norman ancestors were contented to place an inscription on the lid of the stone coffin, or to ornament it with interlacing scroll-work, in which were combined heads of animals, chimeras, flowers, &c.*

The second plate of Mr. Stothard's work representing Jocelyn, bishop of Salisbury, who died A.D. 1184—is curious, as affording an example of both modes of ornament: the effigy of the bishop appears in the usual attitude in which ecclesiastics are placed on seals-the pastoral staff in the left hand, while the middle and fore fingers of the right are raised in the act of giving the benediction. As a border round the figure, runs a band of the interlaced grotesque scroll-work, which in the previous age had been the only and prevailing decoration of tombs, as has been above remarked.

Of the variation in the modes of defensive arms, we have a comprehensive definition :--"Ancient armour may be classed under three distinct periods. In the first, the outward defence of the body was chiefly composed of mail, to apply that as a general term for armour composed of minute pieces, and not strictly with a view to its derivation;" of which derivation Mr. Kempe has left us in the dark: but we suppose he deduces the word from the French maille, annelet de fer, an annulet or little ring of iron; yet the root of the term may probably be searched for still more deeply: in the strict sense it implies a small piece of hammered metal, in barbarous Latin mallia, from malleatus. Thus there was a small current copper coin in France denominated maille; and the black mail, levied by marauders on the northern border, will be recollected by the readers of Sir Walter Scott: there is therefore no impropriety in applying the term to the lorica squamata, the coat of metallic scales, as well as to the lorica lamata, the coat composed of rings hooked together. We resume our quotation: -" Mail was either of small plates of metal, like fish-scales, of square or lozenge-shaped plates or muscles, or of rings, which perhaps were not at first interlinked and rivetted together, but sewn down upon quilted cloth. Examples of all these will be seen by reference to the prints of the Bayeux Tapestry, published by the Society of Antiquaries of London, after Mr. Charles Stothard's original drawings. With this defensive clothing for the body was worn a conical steel cap, with a nasal, and a long kitc-shaped shield. Pot-shaped helmets, flat at the top, and spherical chapelles de fer, were also among the early defences for the head: these were sometimes worn under the hood of the hauberk, which will account for the forms that the chain-mail armour in some instances assumes in figures represented in our effigies and seals. In the second period the mail was externally strengthened about the arms and legs with plates of iron; a helmet covering the head and face was introduced, or a movable ventaille or baviere was added for the same purpose to the scull-cap. The third period enclosed the body from head to foot in plates of steel, and the chain mail only makes its appearance at the aisselles, or arm-pit joints of the armour, either as gussets, or worn underneath as a haubergeon or lighter shirt of mail.. The camail (cap-mail), or gorget of mail, so called from its being attached by a lace to the basinet or cap, was, on account of the pliability which it afforded to the motion of the neck, at first retained, but was ultimately displaced by a gorget of plate. To the breast-plate the protuberant form of a pigeon's breast was given, particularly well calculated to glance off the thrust of a spear, and to prevent the body from his body, royally attired, was conveyed to Worbeing injured by blows causing deep indentacester; over his head was placed a monk's tions in the armour."

The description of the armour of Chaucer's knight, in his Rhime of Sir Thopas, is much in point:—

point:

"Next his sherte an hakaton,
And ovir that an habergeon
For percing of his herte;
And ovir that a fine hauberke
Was all ywrought of Jewis' werke—
Full strong it was of plate;
And over that his cote armure,
As white as is the lily-fleur,
In which he would debate,
His jamheur were of cuir-buly,
His swordis she he of ivory,
His helme of laton bright."

The catalogue of body armour in the above is complete; the knight puts on first his quilted aqueton, and next his habergeon, or coat of mail, above a polished hauberk of plate; over the whole the surcoat of his arms. which he was interred. His head is adorned with a crown of state, and supported by two bishops, undoubtedly intended for Oswald and Walstan; between whose remains he, as before mentioned, actually reposed. He is represented and cuffs edged with a gold sheath of ivory, carved with Gothic ornaments, and jewelled border; his tunic is yellow, or cloth of gold; he is girt with a belt; on his finger of the right hand, which supports a sceptre, while his left grasps a sword; he wears

Of all the periods of ancient armour which have been above described, Mr. Stothard's collection affords beautiful examples. For the chain mail we will select the figures of Geoffrey de Magnaville, Earl of Essex, and of William Longespe, Earl of Salisbury, natural son of Fair Rosamond. For the mail and plate combined, we will take the figures of John of Eltham, Earl of Cornwall, and Sir Robert Shueland, Lord of Minster, in the Isle of Sheppy. For the plate alone, the effigies of Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, and Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick. Examples of sceptred majesty attired in "entre-tissued pall," and dalmatic of Tyrian dye, of wimpled dames, and bishops in their gorgeous copes, are not wanting. But a work of this descrip. tion can be better appreciated through the eye than the ear. Of the style and spirit with which Mr. Kempe has executed his share of the work, (the letter-press illustration,) we have room for a single specimen, which we extract from his account of the effigy of King John, who "in the midst of public commotions (to which his misgovernment had largely con-tributed) was cut off by death at Newark, on the 19th of October, 1216, in the eighteenth year of his reign. His death is assigned by Matthew Paris, a writer who lived in his own time, to natural causes, induced by grief for the disaster which had occurred to his army in crossing the Well-stream, or Lincoln Washes, in his march to oppose Lewis, son of the King of France, who, backed by the discontented barons, pretended to the kingdom. Having rested at Swineshead Abbey, in his way to Newark, for a night, a story gained ground that the final catastrophe of his life was accelerated by poison administered to him by a monk. There is no conclusive circumstantial evidence to support this tale. Speed, the historian, asserts that it was believed as a fact by his son, King Henry III., and refers, as his authority, to the reply made by that king to the bold address of the Prior of the Hospitallers, at Clerkenwell, as related by Matthew Paris. The expressions of that writer, however, appear too vague to support such an inference. These are given as the king's words: 'O quid sibi vult istud, vos Anglici; vultisne me, sicut quondam cester; over his head was placed a monk's cowl, as a sort of cover for all his sins, and a passport to heaven. He was interred between St. Oswald and St. Walstan, whose graves are in the Chapel of the Virgin, at the eastern extremity of the cathedral. Thence, in all probability, his remains underwent translation to their present situation, before the high altar in the choir. The effigy of John, carved in grey marble, which forms the superstructure of his present tomb, was originally the lid of the stone coffin that contained his remains, and in its first position must have been placed on a level with the floor of the building within which he was interred. His head is adorned with a crown of state, and supported by two bishops, undoubtedly intended for Oswald and Walstan; between whose remains he, as before mentioned, actually reposed. He is represented as wearing a dalmatic of crimson, lined with finger of the right hand, which supports a sceptre, while his left grasps a sword; he wears red hose, golden spura; his feet have on them black shoes, resting on a lion. Valentine Green, F.S.A., the historian of Worcester, published a pamphlet, giving a very interesting account of the opening of the tomb of King John, on the 17th July, 1797. The state of the king's mortal relics shewed that they had been at some previous time disturbed, and seemed to favour the conjecture of their having been translated from the Lady Chapel in the cathedral into the choir, most probably about the time of Henry VII. The skull was found turned completely round, and presented what anatomists term the foramen magnum, or aperture through which the spinal marrow passes. The upper jaw lay near the right elbow. agreement of the dress on the body with that of the effigy on the tomb, was very remarkable, and shews, as in the instance of Henry the Second's figure, that these effigies very faithfully represented the defunct as he lay in state. John had, however, no crown on his head or gloves on his hands; in the place of the former was found the celebrated monk's cowl; confirming the minute accuracy of the chronicles. This sacred envelop fitted the head very closely, and had been buckled under the chin by straps, parts of which still remained. The body had been covered with a crimson robe of damask, of strong texture, reaching from the neck to the feet, as in the effigy. Part of the embroidery was still perfect near the left knee. His left arm was bent towards his breast, and the hand had grasped a sword, in the same manner as the figure on the tomb: the cuff of this arm still remained lying on the breast. The sword was much decomposed, and its parts found at intervals down the left side; the scabbard was much more perfect. The covering of the legs (the precise nature of which was not ascertained) was tied round the ankles. These were probably the red hose seen in the effigy. Thus lay royal John, as the immortal dramatiser of his reign has said:

'But now a king—now thus—A clod and module of confounded royalty.'" expressions of that writer, however, appear too vague to support such an inference. These are given as the king's words: 'O quid sibi vult istud, vos Anglici; vultisne me, sicut quondam patrem meum, à regno precipitare atque secare precipitatum?' John, in his last moments, commended his soul to God and St. Walstan; We close this notice with the observation, the end that, when he was liberated from the daughter, he might be engaged with the mograture meum, a regno precipitare atque secare precipitatum?' John, in his last moments, commended his soul to God and St. Walstan; seems to prophesy this; the subject is the monumental sculptures rescued from that universal consumer—the edax rerum. Mr. Kempe's illustrations we find were compiled as a tribute of respect to the memory and great talents of his departed friend, who was prematurely cut off in the midst of his labours. They give a literary character and completion to a work which would, however, otherwise have remained a collection of masterly and splendidly illuminated etchings, from the monuments of eminent personages who flourished in England during the chivalrous age.

WE have as yet only had an opportunity of dipping into two volumes of this work; and do not feel competent to give an opinion upon it. The style is very peculiar; and there are other traits upon which we shall offer our observations when we have perused the whole work. In the mean time we transcribe an extract as a specimen: it relates to Dr. Burney's second marriage.

"In mingling again with the world upon its common terms of cultivating what was good and supporting what was evil, Mr. Burney now, no longer bewitched by beauty, nor absorbed by social sympathies, found literature and its pursuits without rivals in his estimation; yet, in missing those vanished delights, he deemed that he had the world to re-begin: for though prosperity met his professional toils with heightened reputation and reward, they were joyless, however essential, since participation was gone. The time had arrived, and now was passed, for the long-settled project of Mr. Burney of conveying to Paris his second, and, then, youngest daughters, Frances and Charlotte, to replace his eldest and his third, Esther and Susanna, now both returned thence, with every improvement that a kind parent could reasonably de-The time had arrived, and was passed. But if no man can with certainty pronounce what at any stated period he will perform, how much less is he gifted with fore-knowledge of what, at any stated period, he may wish! heartless, nearly desolate, years of lonely con-jugal chasm had succeeded to double their number of nearly unparalleled conjugal enjoy-ment, and the void was still fallow and hopeless, when the yet very handsome, though no longer in her bloom, Mrs. Stephen Allen, of Lynn, now become a widow, decided, for promoting the education of her eldest daughter, to make London her winter residence. Mr. Burney was, of course, applied to for assistance in the musical line; and not less called upon as the most capable judge and counsellor in every The loss that had been sustained by other. Mrs. Allen was that of a very worthy man, whom she esteemed, but to whom she had been married by her parents early in life, without either choice or aversion. In her situation, therefore, and that of Mr. Burney, there was no other affinity than that each had been widowed by the hand of death. Highly intellectual, and fond even to passion of books, Mrs. Allen delighted in the conversation of Mr. Burney; and the hour for his instructions to Miss Allen was fixed to be that of tea-time, to the end that, when he was liberated from the daughter, he might be engaged with the mo-ther. The superior grief of Mr. Burney, as deep as it was acute, was not more prominent than the feeling of admiration that it inspired him with daily increasing interest. Mr. Burnev was not less moved by her commiseration, nor less penetrated by her sympathy; and insensibly he became solaced, while involuntarily she grew grateful, upon observing her rising influence over his spirits. To the tender sentiments of the heart, the avenues are as infinite for entrance as they are difficult for escape; but there are none so direct, and, consequently, none so common, as those through whose gentle mazes soft pity encounters soothing sensibility. The task of consoling the sorrower seems, to its participator, nearly a devout one; and the sorrower, most especially where beauty and spirit meet in that participator, would think resistance to such benevolence might sayour of ingratitude. Those who judge of the sincerity of pristine connubial tenderness merely by its abhorrence of succession, take a very unenlightened, if not false view of human grief; unless they limit their stigma to an eager or facile repetition of those rights which, on their first inauguration, had seemed inviolable and irreplaceable. So still, in fact, they may faithfully, though silently continue, even under a subsequent new connexion. The secret breast, alive to memory, though deprived of sympathy, may still internally adhere to its own choice and fondness; notwithstanding the various and imperious calls of current existence may urge a second alliance - and urge it from feelings and from affections as clear of inconstancy as of hypocrisy; urge it from the best least, a final breach of their engagement: of motives, that of accommodating ourselves to our lot, with all its piercing privations; since our lot is dependant upon causes we have no apart, till all prudential exactions should be means to either evade or fathom, and as remote satisfied. As they were each wholly indefrom our direction as from our wishes. If, by pendent, save from the influence of opinion,any exertion of which mortal man is capable, or any suffering which mortal man can sustain, Mr. Burney could have called back his vanished Esther to his ecstatic consciousness, labour even to decrepitude, endurance even to torture, he would have borne, would have sought, would have blessed, for the most transient sight of her adored form. But she was taken away from him by that decree against which there is no appeal. He who loses a parent, a brother, a sister, a friend, however deeply and deservedly they may be lamented, is never branded with want of feeling if he seek another counsellor and guide, if he accept another companion and favourite. It is but considered to be meeting his destiny as a man who knows he must not choose it; it is but consenting to receive such good as is attainable, while bowing down sub-missively to such evil as is unavoidable. Succession is the law of nature; and, as far as her laws are obvious, it is that which stands foremost. The angel whom Mr. Burney had lost -for an angel both without and within she had seemed to him - had the generous disinterestedness, on the bed of death, to recommend to her miserable husband that he would marry again; well knowing that the tenderness of female friendship would come nearesthowever distant - to the softness of consolation; and, maternally weighing, no doubt, that a well-chosen partner might prove a henediction to her poor children. And this injunction, though heard at the time with agony scarcely supportable, might probably, and strongly, in-fluence his future conduct, when the desperation of hopelessness was somewhat worn away by all-subduing time, joined to forced exertions in business. His Esther had even named to him the lady whom she thought most capable to suit him as a companion, and most tenderly disposed to becoming a mother to his children,-
